PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 25, 1921.

(Legislative day of Friday, July 22, 1921.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Moses	Simmons
Ball	Heflin	Nelson	Smith
Borah	Johnson	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Spencer
Broussard	Kellogg	Norbeck	Stanfield
Bursum	Kendrick	Norris	Sterling
Capper	Kenyon	Oddie	Townsend
Caraway	King	Overman	Trammell
Culberson	Ladd	Phipps	Underwood
Curtis	La Follette	Pittman	Wadsworth
Dial	Lenroot	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	McCormick	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Ernst	McCumber	Ransdell	Warren
Fernald	McKellar	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	McKinley	Robinson	Williams
Harrell	McLean	Sheppard	Willis
Harris	McNary	Shortridge

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is engaged in a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] on account of illness.

I am also requested to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on account of a death in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIS presented the memorial of L. J. Nelson and sundry other citizens of Mount Vernon, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation making stringent regulations for the observance of Sunday in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Benjamin Franklin Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic, of Topeka, Kans., favoring the passage of the so-called La Follette and Norris resolutions relative to Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2299) to incorporate the Women's Overseas Service League; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 2300) to provide for the examination of persons brought before the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 2301) granting the consent of Congress to Old Trail's Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. EDGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 88) granting consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the State of New York and the State of New Jersey for the creation of the port of New York district and the establishment of the port of New York authority for the comprehensive development of the port of New York; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LADD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 89) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DECLARATIONS AND ACTS OF WAR.

Mr. LADD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 116), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas there is no question touching the life and welfare of the people of the United States of such importance as the making of peaceful relations with other Governments; and

Whereas the right of the people to a voice in the settlement of all questions of even less importance is asserted in the Declaration of Independence and guaranteed by the Constitution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no declaration of war by Congress and no act of war by the executive branch of the Government of the United States shall be taken except to suppress insurrection or repel invasion, as provided for by the Constitution of the United States, until the question at issue shall be submitted to a referendum of the voters of the United States.

THE SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ascertain upon inquiry this morning that in so far as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is advised no one is prepared to speak upon the pending bill. I therefore avail myself of the opportunity, under the practices of the Senate, to address the Senate upon a resolution which I introduced some time ago. I ask the Secretary to read the resolution which I offered regarding the Shipping Board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 113), submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on the 19th instant, as follows:

Whereas a controversy has existed since May 1 last, and still exists, between the United States Shipping Board and the men employed upon its ships and between the men and the private owners of American ships, whereby hundreds of ships, including those owned by the Government and those privately owned, and many thousands of men have been made idle; and

Whereas the loss to the owners of the ships as a result of the controversy has amounted to many millions of dollars, and the loss to the men in wages alone has amounted to several million dollars monthly; and

Whereas it is reported that as a result of this controversy large numbers of American seamen are leaving the sea to follow other pursuits, thus threatening the success of the program for the upbuilding and maintenance of an American merchant marine upon which billions of dollars of the people's money have already been expended; and

Whereas the people of this country, who are the real owners of the ships controlled by the United States Shipping Board, have the right to know fully all the facts respecting this controversy; and

Whereas the settlements recently made of strikes and controversies between seamen and ship owners and operators in Great Britain and other countries have released the full maritime resources of those countries to compete with the disorganized merchant marine of this country; and

Whereas the continued disorganization of our merchant marine must result in closing foreign markets to our agricultural and other products, except as they may be carried in foreign ships upon terms dictated by foreign rivals, and presents a situation which menaces the interests of all classes of our people; and

Whereas grave charges against the integrity and efficiency of the management by the Shipping Board of the public business and property committed to its care have been made in the press and in the public debate in the United States Senate; and

Whereas it has been charged in the press and on the authority of responsible men and organizations that in the present controversy the Shipping Board has used its great power in a manner inimical to the men and hostile to organized labor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof to be appointed by it, is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation into the controversy above mentioned and the causes thereof, and into the questions of wages and working conditions involved in said controversy, and into the claims and contentions of the respective parties to said controversy and the merits thereof, and into the conditions existing in the maritime service of this country on both publicly and privately owned ships; and that said committee thoroughly investigate the methods and practices of said Shipping Board, including its attitude toward marine workers and their organizations, and the agreements, understandings, and relations, if any exist, between the shipowners or operators in the United States, including said Shipping Board, and all associations of shipowners among themselves and with the ship owners or operators or associations thereof in other countries, and any control or attempt to control the shipping interests or business of this country, or any portion thereof, or the regulation thereof, by any foreign interests, concerns, or influences whatsoever, and to report its findings and conclusions thereon to the Senate with all convenient speed.

The said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpoenas or otherwise, and to require the production of books, papers, and documents, and to employ counsel and other assistance and stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses, sign subpoenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned as a witness before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who fails or refuses to obey the process of said committee or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, some weeks ago I introduced a resolution somewhat similar to that which has been read, but I did not press it for consideration at that time because about the time the resolution was introduced the new Shipping Board was appointed. I subsequently withdrew the original resolution and introduced a resolution in a somewhat modified form which has just been read by the Secretary.

The resolution provides for an investigation of certain practices of the Shipping Board and of the controversy which has existed since May 1 last between the marine workers and the various owners and operators of American ships, including the Government-owned ships under the control of the Shipping Board.

About the time of the introduction of the first resolution the personnel of the Shipping Board underwent a complete change with the exception of one member. I have waited during the several weeks since to learn whether the plans and policies of the new board promised a solution of the labor controversy and indicated an abandonment of those practices of the old board which I think should be justly condemned.

The present board has shown that so far as its labor policy is concerned it is apparently identical with that of its predecessor, and if its purpose is to change any of the deplorable practices of the old board such purpose has not manifested itself in action so far as I have learned.

I have, of course, no purpose to embarrass the present board by the resolution for an investigation which I have offered; nor in anything that I may say upon this subject is it my purpose to throw any obstacle in the way of any reforms in the practices of the predecessor of the present organized Shipping Board. It must not be assumed, it can not rightfully be assumed, that an investigation such as I propose is in any way hostile to the Shipping Board or its plans or purposes. On the contrary, it should be distinctly helpful to it.

Here is a board of seven men not one of whom, so far as I am aware, ever had any experience in the management or operation of ships or in the business of marine shipping until appointed to his present position. Yet these men are made responsible for the operation of something like 1,400 Government ships, and the disposal of hundreds of others. They are to supervise the construction of ships contracted for, open trade routes, establish trade agencies throughout the world, and generally to build up our maritime commerce.

Of the operation of these ships Admiral Benson said on April 27, last:

We are losing money every day, practically on every ship that we are sailing. We have, as you know, at least 50 per cent of the fleet tied up. We are spending millions every month to keep the ships going. The taxpayers of this country to-day are spending, as near as I can recall the figures, from $14,000,000 to $15,000,000 a month to keep our ships going—what we are running. (Stenographic report furnished by Shipping Board of hearing on wage reduction of seamen, pp. 48, 49.)

Sir, probably $4,000,000,000 of the people's money have already gone into this enterprise, and hundreds of millions, and probably billions, more will be spent under the direction of this board. (See statement of former Commissioner Joseph N. Teal, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 3, 1921, pp. 4415-4427.) All this vast enterprise is taken over by the new Shipping Board in a condition of almost hopeless confusion and disorganization. Under these circumstances whatever information can be obtained by an investigation of the entire subject certainly ought to be welcomed by every person who wishes to see the Shipping Board succeed in the gigantic task which has been assigned to it.

But, more than this, there are two charges which have been constantly made against the Shipping Board almost from the time of its organization down to the present moment. One is that British influences have shaped or influenced the shipping policies of our merchant marine, and the other is that the Shipping Board has been hostile to the labor organizations of the sea. If these charges, or either of them, have any basis in fact then the facts ought to be fully known and the situation properly dealt with. If neither of these charges is true that fact should be established and the Shipping Board freed from the suspicion entertained by millions of our people to-day that its policies are un-American and can never result in building up a genuine American merchant marine.

I propose briefly to examine both of these charges, not with the purpose of proving their truth, but with the purpose of showing that they both have sufficient foundation in fact to not only justify, but to require the investigation which I propose.

Let us consider the labor charge first.

AMERICAN SEAMEN ESSENTIAL TO THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

I lay down this proposition that American seamen are essential to the American merchant marine.

I start this discussion with the proposition, which will not be controverted by anyone at all familiar with the subject, that we can never have an American merchant marine unless we can attract to the marine service and retain in it genuine American seamen and officers to man and operate the ships. I am not going to take the time to elaborate that proposition. Not only does the history of every maritime power in the world prove its truth but the manifest purpose of every country in the world to-day, except the United States, with any maritime pretensions, to man its merchant ships with its own citizens shows how universally the truth of the proposition I have just stated is recognized by the maritime nations of the world.

What good would a fleet of even 10,000 merchant ships have been to us during the late war if they had been manned by the nationals of some other country—possibly alien enemies. Such a fleet would have been a liability and not an asset, at least until such time as we could have trained up American seamen and officers to operate the ships, and this would have been a work of months or years. Even in time of peace we could not maintain American ships manned and operated by foreign seamen. The interests of such seamen would be foreign. If they were able to save a little money they would leave the service and return to their native land. Seamen are not made in a day or a month, but it is a process of years and means years spent on board ship. The officers necessary to navigate American ships could never be obtained except from American crews.

For a hundred years we have had the money; we have had the business; we could easily have had the ships. The reason we did not have a merchant marine was because we had not attracted American seamen to the service.

LABOR POLICY OF THE SHIPPING BOARD.

I now come, sir, to deal with the labor policy of the Shipping Board, not only the Shipping Board as constituted some weeks ago but the Shipping Board as reorganized under the present administration.

It follows from what I have already said that one of the most important and possibly the most important, duty of the Shipping Board is to adopt a labor policy which will attract to our ships genuine Americans of the kind which so largely predominate in our railroad service and other skilled and responsible employments. No matter what business reforms the Shipping Board may adopt, no matter what economies it may devise or what trade routes it may open, if it adopts a labor policy which drives American labor from the ships our attempt to build up an American merchant marine will be a colossal failure and the billions of dollars of the people's money will have been uselessly squandered.

The situation resolves itself into this: We can not have an American merchant marine without American seamen. We will not have American seamen unless we pay the wages and create the working conditions which approximate at least to American standards.

The present members of the Shipping Board when they were appointed a few weeks ago inherited the labor dispute then existing between the seamen and the Shipping Board. So important do I deem this subject that I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a brief statement of the principal points of difference in that controversy.

POINTS OF DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE MEN, THE SHIPPING BOARD, AND THE SHIPOWNERS.

The seamen engaged in that controversy belong to two organizations. One, the National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association; the other, the International Seamen's Union of America. The engineers' association numbers about 16,000 men. The bulk of them are on the Atlantic coast. The International Seamen's Union numbers about 100,000 men made up of three groups. The sailors or deck department constitutes one group; the firemen, oilers, water tenders, coal passers, and wipers make up the engine department, other than the engineers, and constitute another group; and the third group consists of the marine stewards, cooks, bakers, butchers, and waiters, known as the steward or culinary group. A further group, not involved in the present controversy up to this time, is made up of the masters, mates, and pilots, and its organization is known as the National Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots. Their contract does not expire until August 1, 1921. The word "International" is used in the name of the seamen's union because it has branches in Canada. Otherwise it is purely an American organization.

From May 1, 1920, to May 1, 1921, the agreement in force between the private owners, the United States Shipping Board, and the marine firemen, oilers, water tenders, and so forth (one of the groups of the International Seamen's Union), provided the following scale of wages, and I state it for the information of the Senate:

	Wages per month.
Deck engineers	$100
Pumpmen	100
Donkey men	95
Storekeepers	95
Oilers	95
Firemen	90
Coal passers and wipers	75
Water tenders	95

This contract also provided that in port the working hours should be from 8 a. m. to 12 m. and from 1 p. m. to 5 p. m. It also provided for overtime work not necessary for immediate safety—which means practically work in port—at the rate of 60 cents per hour and subsistence for the crew when not fed on board the vessel at the rate of 75 cents per meal, and when compelled to sleep ashore each man was entitled to 75 cents per night for a room. It was further provided that the representative of the seamen's organization should be granted permission to visit vessels upon presenting a pass signed by the owner at the time of paying off and at such other times as were agreeable to the representatives of the owners, but under no consideration should the representative of the organization thereon interfere with the men at work. There were various other provisions designed to secure the health of the men and cleanliness of their quarters. This contract was typical of those made with the other seamen's organizations engaged in the present controversy, excepting that the wage scale is very different from the wage scale which I have just stated. The wage of able seamen provided in the agreement was only $85 a month and $90 a month for marine firemen. With this as a base, the wages were slightly higher or lower, according as the ratings of the men in the respective groups were higher or lower, than the able seamen or marine firemen.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the differences which arose between these seamen's organizations and the Shipping Board and the shipowners.

On January 25, 1921, the representative of the committee on wages and working agreements for the American Steamship Owners' Association wrote Mr. Pryor, secretary of the seamen's organization, urging a revision of the wage and working agreement mentioned and saying:

We now ask you if you will consent: (1) To immediate elimination of overtime; (2) to readjustment of subsistence and room allowance; (3) to a substantial reduction in wages to a basis which will enable American vessels to meet successfully the wage costs of our principal foreign competitors.

I continue to quote from that letter:

Because of the emergency we urge that you make a definite reply to us as soon as possible. Every week that passes sees more and more ships laid up, and we desire to check this process just as soon as our united efforts can accomplish it.

That letter, Mr. President, was dated January 25. On January 26 Admiral Benson, acting chairman of the Shipping Board, addressed a letter to the seamen, in which he urged acceptance of the terms laid down by the owners' association. The terms laid down were not very definite. They might have been definitely understood as they were to be worked out between the shipowners and Admiral Benson, who was then acting chairman of the Shipping Board; but there was nothing in the letter to indicate the extent of the reduction in wages or the changes that would be insisted upon in the rules and working conditions by the shipowners as communicated to the seamen in the letter which they received. Nevertheless, Admiral Benson, in his letter addressed to the seamen on the day following the date of the letter of the shipowners, urged the adoption of the plans proposed by the shipowners. In this letter he said:

I am in accord with the program which has been submitted to you in the attached letter and feel sure that we can count upon your hearty cooperation in taking such steps as are necessary to keep more of our ships in operation and more of our officers and men in the position to earn their livelihood by the practice of their profession.

I beg the attention of Senators to this correspondence. I venture to say that it shows a spirit on the part of the men that should have worked out a solution of this trouble and insured our retention of American citizens in our so-called American merchant marine.

Now, sir, the letter addressed to the seamen's organization by the shipowners' association was dated January 25. The letter of Admiral Benson was dated January 26. On January 31, five days after the date of the letter of the shipowners' association, four days after the date of the letter of Admiral Benson, and probably within three days after those letters were received, the men replied to the steamship owners' letter as follows:

THE AMERICAN STEAMSHIP OWNERS' ASSOCIATION,
Whitehall Building, 17 Battery Place, New York City.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of the 25th instant signed by J. McCarthy, vice chairman of committee on wages and working conditions on board ship, received. After giving your communication the most serious consideration of which our joint grievance committee is capable, we respectfully submit the following to you:

You are urging a revision "at the earliest practicable date, of American wages and working rules," and you do this for the following reasons:

- "1. The general decline in the volume of sea borne commerce.
- "2. The intensifying competition of foreign ships operated at lower costs than American ships."

We respectfully beg to submit that your first reason seems to us to be of such a nature that any alterations in wages, overtime, or working rules will not meet the emergency. We are aware that a very large percentage of the tonnage of Norway, Sweden, Italy, and Great Britain are at present laid up. We, not knowing the real cause, have to accept as a cause, what seems to be the common understanding, namely, that the poverty of Europe, resulting from the war and peace, has made Europe unable to buy American products, either with gold or any other commodities, and that this has resulted in the stoppage of international commerce.

Your second reason—"intensifying competition of foreign vessels operated at lower costs than American ships"—seems to us to have some merit, and we feel that under certain conditions we could induce our membership to accept a revision of existing rules and conditions.

We beg to assure you that we are deeply and earnestly concerned about the development, the profitable operation, and the permanency of an American merchant marine and a real sea power for America. Feeling as we do, that in a large sense our interests are common, we shall be pleased to cooperate with you toward the ends sought to the utmost of our ability and in such a way as to retain under the American flag not only all the vessels but to man them with a sufficiently large number of citizen seamen, so as to make the merchant marine truly American.

You submit three concrete propositions. The first is immediate elimination of overtime; second, readjustment of subsistence and room allowance; third, substantial reduction in wages to a basis which will enable American vessels to meet successfully the wage cost of our principal foreign competitors. We assume that in making these propositions you are thinking of them as principles which you will be willing to modify upon a closer investigation of the facts as they exist here, in Europe, and in Japan. We further assume that you are willing to go into and examine all the facts and that, having thus examined the facts and come to some reasonable understanding that would be constructive and helpful to the building up of an American merchant marine, you would be willing to enter into an agreement for another year based on such facts and understanding.

We beg to assure you that we have from original sources some concrete and late information dealing with wages, subsistence, and overtime paid in European countries. We find that there is none of them who do not pay overtime for certain overtime work, and we find further that our own laws and our own decisions here in the United States run in the same direction. If it be your idea to revise the rules under which overtime is being paid, we shall be pleased to cooperate with you. We feel the same way about subsistence and, to some extent, about wages, but all these would have to be based upon a mutual understanding arising out of mutual good will and mutual and cooperative work for the building up of an American merchant marine.

We respectfully suggest that a conference be called at the earliest possible date, to go into the whole subject matter with a view of such revisions as can be agreed upon and as will then be made the basis for an agreement to carry us through another year.

Again assuring you of our utmost concern and our willingness and desire to cooperate with you on the propositions which we both have in view, and awaiting an early reply, we beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

The same day, mark you—January 31, 1921—the men also wrote Admiral Benson as follows; and I ask the Senate to let me tax their patience to listen to this letter. I think it very important, Mr. President, that the Senate—which is going to be called upon shortly to deal with the matter of increased appropriations for the Shipping Board, and legislation of the greatest importance concerning that organization—should understand in their entirety the details of the differences which have arisen between the American seamen and the Shipping Board; because, sir, I take it that it is almost axiomatic that we can not have an American merchant marine unless we can have American seamen, and we can not have American seamen unless we can preserve such relations with the men who could naturally be called to the sea as will invite and insure their retention upon the sea.

Therefore it seems to me that there must be a proper spirit—there must be such a recognition of the relations between the men who operate the ships, the men who own them, and the Government in whose interest they are run as is manifested at least by Great Britain, our principal rival, and before I finish I shall have occasion to contrast the attitude of Great Britain toward and her treatment of the organizations representing those who run the ships, man the ships, and operate them over on the other side and the attitude of our Shipping Board here and of our shipowners here toward our seamen.

The same day, on January 31, 1921, the men also wrote Admiral Benson as follows:

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENSON,

Chairman United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 26th instant received and same has been submitted to our joint grievance committee, together with the letter which you mentioned in your communication. Inclosed please find copy of letter which we have this day felt it our duty to send to the American Steamship Owners' Association.

In addition to what we have said in the letter to the American Steamship Owners' Association, we respectfully beg to call your attention to the fact that, as chairman of the United States Shipping Board, you are operating about 2,000 American vessels, or those vessels are at least operated under regulations insisted upon and issued by you.

Six years ago there was about 5 per cent of American citizens sailing before the mast, in American vessels. The latest census taken—in the only way it could be taken—indicates that 51 per cent are native Americans. We have no means of accurately ascertaining the number of naturalized Americans, but we do know that there is a considerable number of them.

Six years ago the difference in wages of foreign vessels sailing in competition with American vessels was in some instances so great that competition was impossible, and American vessels went under foreign flags.

The changing of the law—of the status—and of general conditions has brought this large number of native Americans to sea. They are now leaving. We don't know what they are saying when they arrive back home. They are leaving because of lack of work—the disposition of a large number of American shipowners to employ foreigners in preference to Americans—and further because of the strong rumor that wages are to be cut and existing conditions destroyed.

As stated in the letter to the American Steamship Owners' Association, we stand ready, eagerly ready, to cooperate for the upbuilding of a real American merchant marine and of a real sea power for America. We hoped, and still hope, to have the cooperation of the shipowners. We felt sure, and we still feel sure, that we shall be permitted to cooperate with you and the American Government, even though we should not be permitted to cooperate with the American shipowners.

The number of vessels which the Shipping Board controls will determine the wages and conditions for other ships, if the Shipping Board shall so desire. We beg to remind you that the shipowners and seamen of Europe, and it may include Japan, are now meeting at Brussels, Belgium, in an endeavor to arbitrate the hours of labor in maritime commerce and to come to an understanding about such other things as may be possible, and we do not feel that they are seriously considering the interests of the American merchant marine. We feel that in the coming year or two, perhaps three, it will take all the cooperation, good will, and strength of all the different factors constituting the American merchant marine to defend the interests of the growing merchant marine and sea power of the United States.

In the earnest hope and expectation that such cooperation may be arranged for and that such meeting will be called for that purpose and that such meeting will be successful, we beg to remain,

Most respectfully, yours,

Mr. President, how were those letters received by the Shipping Board and the Shipowners' Association? Admiral Benson merely replied, acknowledging receipt of the letter, and the Shipowners' Association did not reply at all to the seamen's letter.

Now, mark you, the last letter I read was dated January 31. Not until some time in April, 1921, was a conference called at New York between the men, the owners, and the Shipping Board; and, mark you, sir, under the existing arrangements the contracts with the men terminated with the last day of April, with such tenders on the part of the seamen's organization as I have presented to the Senate, showing good will, showing a spirit of loyalty to the upbuilding of an American merchant marine.

This matter was permitted to drift along to within a few days of the expiration of the contracts under which they had been working for a year, and then a conference was called in New York. At that conference the owners finally delivered their ultimatum by presenting the form of a reduced wage scale which they would require all men to sign if they were to continue service on the ships after the 30th day of April, 1921.

A copy of the wage scale proposed for the firemen, oilers, and water tenders is herewith submitted, and this, with the contract to which I shall make reference later, was typical of their attitude toward the other organizations. I submit this wage scale because I have already stated to the Senate the scale of wages paid to the firemen, oilers, and water tenders.

It will be remembered by Senators that the wages under the existing contracts were as follows, and I repeat this scale in order that it may be in the minds of Senators when I state the changes which the shipowners, backed up by the Shipping Board, proposed to enforce:

	Wages per month.
Deck engineer.....	$100.00
Pumpman.....	100.00
Donkeyman.....	95.00
Storekeeper.....	95.00
Oiler.....	95.00
Fireman.....	90.00
Coal passer and wiper.....	95.00
Water tender.....	95.00

The wage scale which they proposed was as follows:

	Wages per month.
Deck engineer.....	$75.00
Pumpman.....	75.00
Donkeyman.....	70.00
Storekeeper.....	70.00
Oiler.....	70.00
Fireman.....	67.50
Coal passer and wiper.....	55.00
Water tender.....	70.00

It amounted to a cut of a little more than 25 per cent in the wages of the men—that is, what is called the base wage as applied to this schedule. This proposed wage scale reduced the base pay over 25 per cent and abolished all overtime pay, making, in fact, a total reduction of from 40 to 60 per cent in the wages of the men at one stroke.

But that was not all. To the proposed wage cut there was added an equally harsh and drastic revision of the rules, to which I will direct attention later.

It was proposed that the men should accept the slashing cut in wages, together with the revision of the rules, which imposed intolerable working conditions, and sign a new contract binding them to these proposals. But the shipowners reserved the right to abolish the contract at any time on 30 days' notice. Of course, this form of contract was rejected by the men. The proposals of the men were either all rejected or not considered at all, and the meeting ended. It should be stated in this connection that before men take service on board ship they are called up and individually required to sign the articles which contain the substance of the contract. If they refuse to sign, they are ordered off the ship. It was for failure to sign this proposed contract that the men were ordered off the ship by the officers. The so-called strike of the men, therefore, is really a lockout by the owners.

At the New York conference in April between the owners, the Shipping Board, and the men it was specifically stated by the seamen's delegation that the matter of first importance was the development of the American merchant marine. The second was wages and working conditions. It was pointed out that when the so-called seamen's bill became a law it was generally admitted that there were less than 7 per cent of native Americans sailing under the American flag, licensed officers excepted. On the 1st of December, 1920, there were 51 per cent of native Americans, licensed officers excepted, sailing under the American flag, and there was at least 10 per cent additional of naturalized citizens in the same service. This included the Lakes, coastwise, and ocean vessels.

Subsequently a meeting was called by Admiral Benson in Washington, in which he met the seamen's representatives, and after some discussion it was proposed by the seamen to submit the matters in controversy to the President of the United States, who, under the law, exercised large control over the board. This proposition was rejected. The men, however, as a last resort did address the President on the subject in a communication dated April 29, 1921, which contains a complete but brief review of what had occurred in the conferences to which I have referred.

Now, Mr. President, I read this letter, because in it the men submitted the whole matter to the discretion of the President, with the distinct statement that their interests were so great in the maintaining of a truly American merchant marine that they would accept any conditions that he imposed, to continue for a year. The letter reads:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 29, 1921.

MR. PRESIDENT: This is a report and a prayer. All the agreements and arrangements between shipowners organized in the American Steamship Owners' Association, the United States Shipping Board, the organized marine engineers, sailors, firemen, marine cooks and stewards, these last three constituting the International Seamen's Union of America, will cease with to-morrow night.

The shipowners offered us a reduction amounting to 25 per cent on wages and subsistence, and the abolition of all pay for overtime work. This took place in the month of January. We wrote them a letter offering to meet them to do the utmost possible to come to an understanding, to take effect immediately, and to run until April next, 1922. There was no meeting until the 19th of this month. Then they offered us conditions that were utterly impossible for us to accept. We countered with certain propositions which we deemed of absolute necessity for the upbuilding and preservation of the personnel of the merchant marine of America. They refused. We met them again on the 25th, and they refused to consider our proposals. This ended the meetings in New York.

Admiral Benson, chairman of the Shipping Board, called everybody interested to meet here in Washington on Wednesday, the 27th. There was a 10 per cent reduction in the cut proposed to us here, making it 15 per cent of the actual wages signed for on the articles; but the total cut would, under the rules proposed, be from 40 to 60 per cent of the actual income of the men employed; but no other change in the other things, except that in so far as the carrying out of the law was concerned, the admiral declared himself entirely in favor of the carrying out of the law and that he would do what he could to have the law enforced.

We submitted as a proposition that in the matter of employment the American citizen would have the preference for any rating which we would be qualified to fill and that men with intention papers should have the next chance of employment, basing their preference amongst them upon the length of time that such intention papers had been held. This was refused. There were several other propositions made and refused. Whereupon we made the offer to submit the entire question to you, declaring ourselves willing to accept whatever you should deem most advantageous to the building up of a merchant marine for the United States, and that in order to prevent any stoppage at all the present condition should remain until you had an opportunity to act upon the situation. This was first refused by Admiral Benson, stating that he would not burden you with this matter. It was then peremptorily refused by the shipowners. We renewed our offer and again were refused. Whereupon, it was stated by us that we felt that we did not burden you by submitting our judgment to yours. We felt that we were doing our duty to you and to the merchant marine.

We now respectfully submit the matter to you in the firm faith that you will act for the development and maintenance of the merchant marine.

(Signed) W. S. BROWN,
President Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association.
(Signed) ANDREW FURUSETH,
President International Seamen's Union of America.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington.

Without waiting for the President's answer to the seamen's letter, or to take any action in the premises, the owners on the next day, April 30, when the existing contracts had expired, excluded the men from the ships and the lockout was on.

An examination of the history of these negotiations shows that there was never any serious objection on the part of the men to accept a cut of 15 per cent in wages. The men refused to accede, however, to the proposals in which the Shipping Board and private owners agreed, to wit:

(a) Denial of the right of the men to have a representative of the unions present when they sign on or are paid off. That is on shipboard, and is only intended to insure a perfect understanding on the part of the men who sign as to what they are signing.

(b) Abolition of the three watches or 56-hour week for the men. That was one of the conditions that was imposed by the new rules and regulations—that the three watches should be taken away—and that meant an extension of the length of time that men should be required to serve on shipboard in maintaining two watches instead of three.

(c) Abolition of all pay for overtime.

(d) Reduction of subsistence allowance.

(e) The refusal to enter into any contract with the men exceeding six months or which was not subject to termination on 30 days' notice.

That the Shipping Board, as charged by the men, used its great power through the allocation of ships to prevent the men making more favorable terms with shipowners is shown by the orders which it issued.

Even where shipowners were willing to pay these men the then existing wages and continue them the power of the Shipping Board was exerted everywhere with shipowners who desired to secure the allocation of American ships to prevent their paying the men according to their own idea of what was fair.

I quote from the Journal of Commerce, May 7, 1921, mail edition, page 20:

WASHINGTON, May 5.

Admiral Benson declared to-day that any operating companies which violate instructions not to sign on men at the old wage scale will have their vessels withdrawn. These statements from the Shipping Board chairman also declare between 45 and 50 ships cleared to-day from various ports. Immediately following statement in the press this morning that several companies have taken on men at the old rate wage scale Admiral Benson started an investigation to determine the truth of the report. It was said that the Polish-American Navigation Co., United States Transport Co., and the C. W. Morse Co., operators of Government vessels, had agreed to pay the former wages. "There will be no leniency for these companies," Admiral Benson said, "if it is found that the reports are correct."

When it is remembered that at the time this order or statement was issued a number of the lines were ready to sign up with the men on terms more favorable than those offered by the Shipping Board it is readily seen how this threat, which amounted to notice that allocations of ships would be withdrawn from such companies, operated to prevent a settlement.

Besides this the American Shipowners' Association, chambers of commerce, and other institutions of great financial power combined to destroy the resistance of the seamen by all means in their power. For example, here is a telegram, under date of May 4, 1921, sent by the executive officers of the seamen in San Francisco to their New York office, which reads:

Seafarers' Council interviewed Frey of steamers Yale and Harvard. Is paying scale and overtime as of 1920 and in some instances more. Not member of American Shipowners' Association. Stands alone in that respect on Pacific coast. Is desirous of meeting all demands of organization, but fears to sign 12 months' agreement on account of chamber of commerce in Los Angeles and San Francisco, who would bring influence to have his fuel supply stopped. Immense pressure is being brought to bear on Vice President and General Manager Frey from American Shipowners' Association and other sources, as shown us by telegrams. Council favors operation on these two boats only, with no other exceptions, in view of knowledge at their hands and existing circumstances.

In addition to this, I have in my possession original affidavits, which, if they are true, show coercion and deception on the part of the agents of the Shipping Board in procuring men to sign up for sea duty. I also have a blank form of a letter purported to be signed by a representative of the Shipping Board and used in sending nonunion men, with their expenses paid from Chicago to Seattle, to take the place of union seamen. I do not care to put these original documents into the Record, but will be glad to submit them to the committee which undertakes the investigation under the resolution I have offered.

Not only have the new members of the Shipping Board done nothing of which I am aware to repudiate the acts of their predecessors, but they appear to have ratified and confirmed them. In the report of the proceedings of the convention of the American Federation of Labor held in Denver I find the following, purporting to be a press dispatch from Washington under date of June 17, 1921:

The "open shop" will be strictly enforced in the American merchant marine, Chairman Lasker, of the Shipping Board, announced Thursday. Mr. Lasker emphasized that there will be no discrimination against union seamen, provided they make no attempt to harass nonunionists or men who were hired to fill their places in the recent strike.

In the same report appears a telegram sent from the seamen's representatives in Washington to the president of the International Seamen's Union, at Denver, which says:

Representatives of the Atlantic district union this morning officially met with O'Connor and Benson as subcommittee for the new Shipping Board, at which undersigned were present. Both commissioners stated plainly that the new board would not give unions' agents privilege of visiting docks or ships. They also definitely stated that no new agreements would be ratified for longer than six months.

As illustrative of the attitude of the great labor bodies of this country, I quote further from the resolutions adopted by the American Federation of Labor at its annual meeting at Denver and contained in the published reports of its proceedings, in which it is directly charged:

That the Government, with its power and money, is to create, foster, and perpetuate the nonunion shop, proscribing the union men; and, second, that there is to be a further general reduction of wages in January, 1922.

Again, in the same resolution, it is said:

The United States Shipping Board is now, while hiding behind the smoke screen of hostility to trade-unions, torpedoing the merchant marine and sea power of these United States.

It will be said by some that this is prejudiced testimony. I am not discussing that. It is the testimony of all organized labor in this country concerning the United States Shipping Board. If it represents an erroneous view, it should be corrected by giving the widest publicity to the truth. If it represents the correct view, then certainly the public is entitled to know it.

That this view is not peculiar to organized labor appears from the article of Horace B. Drury in the Journal of Political Economy, volume 29, January, 1921, where, in the course of a most friendly discussion of the workings of the Shipping Board, he said:

The practical operations of the Shipping Board have, to a very large extent, been in the hands of a small group of shipping men, who represented in their former associations a group particularly hostile to trade-unionism.

Since the new members of the present Shipping Board took office the marine engineers—who must be distinguished from the so-called deck engineers—have signed a six months' agreement accepting a 15 per cent cut in wages and agreeing substantially to the other conditions laid down by the Shipping Board and the private owners respecting the union which I have enumerated. Marine engineers are, of course, really licensed officers, and their pay is about double that of the ordinary seamen. This so-called settlement, of course, means that the whole question will be reopened by this organization in January. There has been no settlement, however, with the groups constituting the International Seamen's Union. The strike has merely been declared off on the Atlantic coast, which means that many thousands of the seamen will leave the sea service, in fact already have done so, and that others will make the best terms for themselves possible, renewing the struggle at a more opportune time.

Our entire force of seamen is therefore dissatisfied and smarting under a sense of wrong and injustice. Those who intend to continue in the marine service are only waiting the time when the demand for seamen will enable them to open the battle again with greater hope of success.

How different is the situation presented by our chief maritime competitor, Great Britain, and in fact every other country with which we must compete upon the seas. The responsible authorities in Great Britain adopted exactly the opposite course from that pursued by our Shipping Board. Instead of making war upon the seamen's organizations she has fostered and encouraged them. The Government, with the assistance of the unions, has established training schools from which the boys are sent on board ships to serve their apprenticeship in order to become able seamen. This practice of shipping boys or young men on board ship to learn the business was adopted to some extent in our merchant marine by agreement with the unions during the war, and the United States Shipping Board abandoned the practice at the first opportunity.

The result of the British policy is that British seamen have accepted a wage cut of £2 10s. per month, amounting to about 15 per cent of their war-time wage, other conditions remaining unchanged, and as a consequence the seamen's unions of that country are working in harmony with the shipowners to extend British maritime trade.

I am permitted to quote from a letter under date of June 14, last, written by J. Havelock Wilson, member of Parliament, president of the Sailors' and Firemen's Union of Great Britain and Ireland, and also a member of the maritime board, in which, writing to Mr. Furuseth, president of the International Seamen's Union of America, he said:

It seems strange to me that the owners in America are so strong on the "open shop," whereas the owners on this side are doing everything they can to make it the "closed shop." As a matter of fact the great majority of the owners have turned the entire shipping of men over to us and many of them have expressed the view that they do not know how they could do without us.

This is one particular, at least, in which we could well afford to learn from our great maritime rival.

A careful review of the controversy between the American seamen and the shipowners shows that the question of wages was secondary; that the men were at all times willing to sit down with the owners and revise the working rules; that it was the conditions on board the vessels and the conditions attendant upon the signing on and paying off of the men that were the primary points of dispute, for in this was involved the question whether or not the men would remain at sea and whether or not we could have a merchant marine manned by American sailors. The fight which the seamen have been making is much more than a fight for themselves. They have been making a fight upon the issue of which depends the question whether we shall have an American merchant marine or not.

The wages which they have offered to accept are far below that necessary to maintain an American standard of living. According to the Monthly Labor Review for December, 1919, the cost in August and September of 1919 of maintaining a family of five at the health and decency level was $2,126.47.

Of the budget referred to, the Monthly Labor Review said:

It was intended to establish a bottom level of health and decency, below which a family can not go without danger of physical and moral deterioration. This budget does not include many comforts which should be included in a proper American standard of living.

The cost of maintaining a family in 1919, as shown by the Department of Labor, was $2,126.47. The latest figures furnished by the Department of Labor, based upon its investigation of prices in 32 leading cities in the United States, establishes the fact that the reduction in the cost of living in this country since December, 1919, and down to May, 1921, six weeks ago, is exactly 18.9 per cent. Applying this percentage of reduction to the cost of maintaining a family at the health and decency level in 1919, establishes the cost at $1,724.57.

While it is true that the seaman is furnished his food on shipboard, it is to be remembered that he is never employed more than 9 or 10 months out of the year and is often out of employment half the time, no matter how efficient and industrious he may be.

While the above and all similar figures are more or less approximations, they demonstrate conclusively that the wages received by seamen, even their war wages, if you please, do not permit a decent standard of living. On such wages no sailor could hope to maintain a home, however humble, or support a wife and children.

I am aware that it is said that seamen's wages must be reduced in line with the policy of economy demanded of the Shipping Board. Look at the facts for a moment. Admiral Benson, testifying before the Subcommittee on Appropriations, May 9, 1921—see page 551 of the hearings—said:

I think that the question of wages is always a little exaggerated, because under any system it is not much over 10 per cent of the total cost of operation.

I think the figures usually given are from 7 to 8 per cent, but accepting Admiral Benson's figures, it follows that out of every thousand dollars cost of operating a ship 10 per cent, or $100, would represent the seamen's wages. Fifteen per cent of this, which is the reduction insisted upon by the Shipping Board and agreed to by the men, is $15. Therefore it follows that the proposed reduction in wages would only amount to $15 out of every thousand dollars cost of operation, or $1,500 out of every hundred thousand dollars cost of operation.

The mistakes of an unskilled or inefficient crew in looking after the machinery or in the amount of fuel unnecessarily consumed would more than offset this so-called wage saving in a single voyage. It is not a question of wages at all. It is a question of destroying the men's organizations and of subjecting them to working conditions which they will not stand, and ultimately a question of driving the American seamen and the American merchant marine from the sea, enabling the shipowners to employ cheaper foreign labor and make still larger profits.

Think for a moment of the profits made and the surplus accumulated by every steamship company that has been engaged in business during the last five years. I have before me the figures showing the profits made and surplus accumulated by the principal ones. I am not going to stop to read them all, but they are fabulous. I ask leave, Mr. President, to insert them in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. During the pendency of a bill which seeks to undermine the seamen's act, which was passed in 1915, there appeared before the committee of the House of Representatives certain witnesses, who were either themselves the owners or representing the owners of two of the lake steamship companies, who stated that it was impossible for them to operate with any profit their companies under the existing condition. They put up in their testimony there a most pitiful appeal as to their hard financial situation. Mr. President, under the law those steamship companies were required to submit to the Interstate Commerce Commission sworn statements with respect to their earnings, and since having my attention called to their testimony given before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I have had occasion to look into the sworn statements which they filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I name in the tables which I have asked to have inserted in my remarks the important companies which are typical of the lake service, and show what they earned upon their capital stock and what they were able to carry as surplus, in addition to the enormous earnings which they made. I merely call attention now to the profits of two of the companies who stated their sad plight before the House committee:

The Ashley & Dustin Co., having a capital stock in 1921 of $215,500; a net income from 1916 to 1920 of $149,249.35; rate on capital, 69.3 per cent; annual average rate, 13.9 per cent. Besides that, they carried over and added to surplus from 1916 to 1920, $124,340, or more than half of their total capital.

The Goodrich Transit Co. is one of the companies testifying as to the hard conditions under which they find themselves in operating their vessels. They are capitalized at $500,000; net income from 1916 to 1920, $417,082.63; rate on capital, 67.6 per cent; annual average rate, 13.5 per cent; dividends paid, $171,105.14; and carried to surplus, $333,812 in that period of time. I will not take the time of the Senate, Mr. President, to go into that matter more fully.

I have also here a table showing the profits of certain overseas lines which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without taking the time to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Compare these profits with the $75 or $100 a month received by even the able seamen—$85 a month, however, was the maximum for able seamen, even in war time—and it is obvious that the real controversy does not hinge upon saving a few dollars by cutting the monthly wages of the men. Besides all this, American shipowners are already given a subsidy by their exemption from taxation, providing only they will put the money back into new construction, which far more than equalizes any difference in wages that may exist between this and other countries. I refer to section 23 of what is commonly called the Jones Act. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Mar. 3, 1921, p. 4425.)

I am not aware that American seamen have ever claimed special credit for helping to win the World War. They are entitled, none the less, to great credit for the heroic and patriotic part they played in that work. Early in the war the representatives of all American seamen joined with the Shipping Board, with the Secretary of Labor, and with the private owners in an earnest appeal for all American seamen to return to American ships. More than that, at their convention in Buffalo, N. Y., December 3 to 12, 1917, they issued and gave nation-wide publicity to the following call:

A CALL TO THE SEA.

To all seafaring men ashore or afloat:

The International Seamen's Union of America, in annual convention assembled, representing the organized seamen of America, submits the following to all men of seafaring experience, ashore or afloat:

The Nation that proclaimed your freedom now needs your services. America is at war. Our troops are being transported over the seas. Munitions and supplies are being shipped in ever-increasing quantities to our armies in Europe. The bases are the ports of America. The battle fields are in Europe. The sea intervenes. Over it the men of the sea must sail the supply ships. A great emergency fleet is now being built. Thousands of skilled seamen, seafaring men of all capacities who left the sea in years gone by as a protest against the serfdom from which no flag then offered relief, have now an opportunity to return to their former calling, sail as free men, and serve our country.

Your old shipmates, men who remained with the ship to win the new status for our craft, now call upon you to again stand by for duty. Your help is needed to prove that no enemy on the seas can stop the ships of the Nation whose seamen bear the responsibility of liberty.

America has the right, a far greater right than any other nation, to call upon the seamen of all the world for service. By responding to this call now you can demonstrate your practical appreciation of freedom won.

All men of seafaring experience can get further information on this subject by applying to any representative of the United States Shipping Board or to any officer or representative of the International Seamen's Union of America or any of its district organizations. It should be understood that this statement is not issued because of any real shortage of men at this time. We must be prepared, however, to man the great new merchant fleet now building. Men must be ready and in training. It is in recognition of this need that we, as a duty to the Nation, submit this call to all seamen.

INTERNATIONAL SEAMEN'S UNION OF AMERICA.

After the war was over and the victory won, Robert P. Bass, director of the Industrial Relations Division, in his report to the United States Shipping Board under date of February 1, 1919, had this to say of American seamen:

The most serious aspect of the marine and dock labor situation, however, was not the expansion or the danger but the extreme need for continuous and efficient labor and the ease with which groups or individuals might have delayed traffic. As time passed the possibility of any interruption of traffic became constantly a matter of greater and greater national concern. The whole situation, indeed, was such as to afford unusual temptation to the men to try to take things into their own hands, and there were few industries where there were better opportunities or more dangers in the matter of enemy propaganda. * * *

Fortunately for the success of the allied cause, no such disaster occurred. * * * The burden placed upon marine and longshore employees was carried loyally and successfully. * * * Not only was a tremendous volume of material handled effectively but in the whole field of marine and dock labor there was no serious disaffection or interruption of traffic during the period while the United States was at war. As far as the licensed officers and seamen on vessels were concerned, the elimination of strikes was practically complete, which was also true of the crews on harbor craft and barges. * * *

The successful operation of America's merchant fleet during the war was to a very large extent due to the patriotism and sound leadership which prevailed among the men.

These, sir, are the men who now justly complain that the Government which they labored so heroically and patriotically to serve has through the United States Shipping Board denied them the opportunity to work on American ships at a decent wage and under decent conditions. One of the first results of the labor policy of the Shipping Board is that the extremely turbulent element of the seamen's organizations, encouraged thereby, are now trying to secure control of the seamen's union. The struggle has already begun on the Atlantic coast and is threatened on the Pacific coast. When the leaders to whose "patriotism and sound leadership" Mr. Bass paid such a high compliment are unable to secure from the United States Shipping Board either recognition for their union or reasonable working conditions for the men, a state of feeling is created on the part of the men of which the irresponsible and turbulent element among them is quick to take advantage. If our bitterest enemies had dictated the labor policy of the Shipping Board during the present controversy with the men, the board could not have done more than it has done to drive American seamen from our ships, thus nullifying our efforts to maintain a truly American merchant marine.

In conclusion, I again remind Senators that at the close of the year 1913, shortly before the seaman's law was passed, less than 7 per cent of the crews, exclusive of officers, on our merchant ships was made up of native Americans. The reason for this is plain. The American would not live and work under the conditions of service which obtained on board our ships.

All this was changed in a few years by the passage of the seaman's law. Though this law has never been properly enforced and has been constantly under fire by those concerns in this country and abroad who are interested in getting the cheapest possible sea labor, nevertheless it has worked a transformation in the personnel of American seamen. The best estimates I have been able to get indicate that just prior to May 1 of this year, when the ill-advised conduct of the Shipping Board precipitated the trouble with the men, there was in excess of 50 per cent of native Americans in the crews sailing under the American flag. In addition to this there was a very considerable number of naturalized Americans in these crews. The war probably added somewhat to these numbers, but the other opportunities for service to the country were so numerous the young American would never have been attracted to the seaman's life on board our ships except for the seaman's law that made it a decent and responsible occupation. For several years, also, prior to May 1 we had followed the English plan and established contractual relations between the seamen's organizations and the shipowners, and this had brought about a large measure of cooperation between the owners and the organizations of the men. All this is now changed, and changed primarily as a result of the mistaken policy of the Shipping Board.

In Great Britain the National Maritime Board, organized during the war to adjust maritime labor disputes, is still continued in successful operation. The National Sailors' and Firemen's Union of Great Britain and Ireland, which is the great seamen's union of Great Britain, is officially recognized and dealt with, and is working in perfect harmony with the shipowners. A reduction in the seamen's pay has been agreed upon between the British unions and the shipowners, and for approximately the same percentages of decrease the seamen were willing to accept in this country, but otherwise the conditions are unchanged. Great Britain is not making war upon her seamen's organizations, as the Shipping Board and private owners are doing in this country, but is strengthening her unions in every way, thus making British labor feel that it is an important factor and shares in the responsibility of maintaining Great Britain's merchant marine.

The same leadership which Mr. Bass extolled so highly in the report from which I have read was available to the United States Shipping Board in peace as well as war. That leadership was just as patriotic in peace as in war, and its supreme desire was to see American ships manned by American seamen under working conditions which made the seamen's calling an honorable one in which the best class of American labor might be enlisted. Accordingly the unions asked that preference be given to the American citizen in obtaining sea employment. Think of that for a moment! Not that preference be given to the unions but to American citizens in employment upon American ships! That was denied by the Shipping Board and the shipowners' association. The unions then asked that the men might have, as previously, the help of the regular representative of the union when the men were paid off and signed on. This was denied. The three watches or 8-hour day was withdrawn by the shipowners. Subsistence allowances were reduced, and in fact everything done which could be done to restore the old régime on board our ships. Plainly it was felt by the shipowners that the present dull period of shipping presented an excellent opportunity to enforce hard conditions on the men. The seamen's organizations in this country are anxious to cooperate with the shipowner and with the Government as heretofore to maintain the American merchant marine. They have established schools at their own expense to increase the skill and efficiency of the men. When all attempts to reach an understanding with the private owners and the Shipping Board had failed they proposed to leave the entire question and all questions involved with President Harding and to abide by his decision.

Find, if you can, anywhere in controversies between labor and capital a broader, more liberal spirit than that—a spirit more loyal to the best interests of the country. These men, when they could get no consideration and arrive at no understanding with either the Shipping Board or the owners, took this controversy to the President, and said: "You decide it, and we will continue at work upon whatever conditions you fix." But the forces, whatever they were, that were determined to bring on a crucial contest between the men and the shipowners of this country were too strong to be resisted. The lockout was put into effect, and we find our sea labor to-day disorganized, dissatisfied, and rebellious. The conditions exist which every enemy of the American merchant marine must desire to have exist.

But I believe it is not too late to change the labor policy of the Shipping Board. Whatever the Shipping Board does the private owner must do. I think I have shown that the men made every reasonable effort to come to terms with the board. Their efforts were unavailing because the Shipping Board returned to the reactionary labor policies of a generation ago, and refused to follow in this respect the enlightened policy of Great Britain or to learn from our own experience during the last few years. It is simply robbing the people of this country to continue appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars for the use of the Shipping Board if it is committed to a labor policy that spells disaster to our merchant marine.

Mr. President, in my discussion so far I have dealt simply with the labor question as it is involved in the building up and maintaining of our merchant marine. I have not touched upon, directly at least, the charge that British influences are shaping the shipping policies of our merchant marine and our Shipping Board. I shall take up that question very soon—very soon—in connection with my resolution for an investigation. I shall speak of that when I can call up that resolution and have it laid before the Senate. We do not know, we can not know without an investigation, the extent to which British influences and propaganda are interfering with our efforts to build up and maintain an American merchant marine. I propose, however, when I discuss that branch of the subject, to lay before the Senate certain facts which will demand the most serious attention of every Senator and every person who is a friend of the American merchant marine.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in reference to the unfinished business, S. 1915, I wish to submit a few observations and take a little time just now, since there seems to be nothing particularly pressing on the attention of the Senate, to refer to some of the considerations which have led me to favor very cordially this bill.

I know there is some talk about "class legislation," and it would be almost amusing, if it were not so serious, to observe that that sort of talk comes mainly from people who are constantly urging legislation for the benefit of some particular interest. It seems to me that agriculture is such a vital, fundamental, and extensive industry that it can scarcely be separated from every interest affecting the people of the whole country. It is, of course, the largest single industry in the country, but it concerns not only the people directly engaged in agriculture, possibly exceeding 30,000,000 of our population, but it concerns every individual who wears clothes and eats food; every person who is not indifferent regarding the welfare of the people and the prosperity of the country.

Therefore we can not reasonably charge those who are making an effort to promote the interests of those engaged in agriculture, to encourage them, stimulate them, and to bring about a healthy agriculture in this country with advocating measures for the benefit of some particular class or interest.

We are now being furnished with the printed reports of the Department of Commerce giving the census figures for the year 1920. I have before me some of those figures. It appears from a statement sent out by the Department of Commerce, under date of July 1, that the number of farms in the United States in 1920 was 6,448,366; that the number of farms operated by tenants in the United States in 1920 was 2,454,746, about 38.1 per cent of the farms being operated by tenants. The remainder are supposed to be operated by the owners of the farms.

From this it appears, estimating five people on every farm, which is an underestimate rather than an overestimate, that there are some 32,000,000 people who live nearest the fountain of life in the divine economy, and they ought not to be the most burdened and the least compensated of all the people engaged in the undertakings of life under our Government.

That is not a very satisfactory condition, either—for 38.1 per cent of all the farms to be operated by tenants. One of the objects of the farm loan act was to provide a means whereby every man who cultivates a farm might own that or some other farm. One provision was that he could borrow 50 per cent of the actual value of the farm he desired to purchase, give his mortgage to the Federal land bank, and obtain the money at 5½ per cent, with the privilege of paying off the principal at the rate of 1 per cent per annum; and if it was found impossible to furnish one-half of the purchase price of the farm, in many instances it was presumed, and undoubtedly was true, that the proposed purchaser could arrange with the seller of the land to take a second mortgage for his half of the purchase price, giving the first mortgage to the Federal land bank, thereby acquiring his own home.

Undoubtedly the ideal condition in any country is to have every man live under his own vine and fig tree, and I hope the time is not far distant when the number of these tenants will be decreased and the ownership of the farms will be invested in the men who operate the farms.

These figures are interesting further, Mr. President. The circular to be issued on the 27th of July gives us the value of farm property in the United States in 1920, and the figures are as follows:

All farm property, Jan. 1, 1920.....$77,925,989,073
Land and buildings.....66,334,309,556
Implements and machinery.....3,595,317,021
Live stock on the farms.....7,996,362,496

Other items were separated, as land alone, buildings, and so forth. I will ask to have that statement inserted in the Record precisely as it appears in the circular issued by the Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census. This gives us an idea of the extent and the importance of this great industry, involving farm property amounting to $77,925,989,073.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it may be that the condition of the farmers in this country is not altogether as distressing as we have sometimes had it pictured here. Unquestionably, however, agriculture is languishing. Unquestionably the condition is such as to cause the abandonment of farms. There can be no doubt that under present conditions there is no future offered to the young man who would undertake farming as an occupation and a life work. We must do what we can to change that situation, because the prosperity of the country, the prosperity of every other industry, the welfare of the people, depend upon a prosperous and a healthy agriculture.

The number of mortgages on farms in this country is given also in this bulletin of July 1, 1921.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, does the Senator intend to make that a part of his remarks? I think that information is very valuable.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I am just putting in these figures separately.

The total number of farms mortgaged in 1920 was 1,611,378. The aggregate amount of the mortgages on farms in this country was $4,112,711,213.

In 1910 the aggregate of the mortgages upon farms in this country was $1,726,172,851. There has been an increase in farm mortgages of 132.5 per cent in the last 10 years.

We endeavored to meet the financial needs of those engaged in agriculture by establishing the only system ever in operation here providing for long-term credits, the law being known as the farm loan act. There is not any question but what the operation of that act has been of immense benefit to the farmers of the country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STANFIELD in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did I hear the Senator correctly to state that the farm mortgages had increased 132.5 per cent in the last five years?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is according to the figures here.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the Senator any figures to show the increase in value of those farms during the same period?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the census report does show that the value has increased. I think I can furnish that: The total value of all farm property on April 5, 1910, was $40,991,449,090. The land and buildings are now worth $66,334,309,556, and were estimated to be worth on April 15, 1910, $34,801,125,697.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So the value of the lands and buildings has more than doubled, as well as the mortgages?

Mr. FLETCHER. Very nearly doubled; yes.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. More, is it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the difference between sixty-six billion and thirty-four billion. It has very nearly doubled. Under the farm loan act the financial needs of the farmer could be met to a certain extent and upon practically his own terms, and there have been loans to farmers in the United States, according to the statement just furnished by the Farm Loan Board, in pursuance of that legislation, the following amounts, according to this statement of June 30, 1921:

Net mortgage loans by the Federal land banks, $356,106,112.48; and by the joint-stock land banks, established under provisions in the farm loan act, $78,255,961.84 have been loaned, making a total of loans to those actually engaged in farming—because the money can not be loaned to anybody else, according to the very terms of the act—in pursuance of provisions of the farm loan act, $434,362,074.32.

Mr. POMERENE. How many borrowers were there?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not here a statement of the number of borrowers; but, of course, the act limits borrowing from the Federal land banks to $10,000 by any one individual. The joint-stock land banks can loan more than that.

In spite of the litigation that was instituted in order to destroy that system by those who had benefited by making loans to farmers at much higher rates of interest, and getting commissions on those loans, foreclosing, and so on, renewing every three or five years, in spite of that litigation, which paralyzed the operation of this system for from 12 to 18 months, it has found for the farmers of this country this amount of money which I have mentioned, at 5½ per cent per annum, with the privilege of paying off the principal at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, and with the further privilege of paying off any or all of the principal at any interest period after five years.

It has been proposed. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], as I recall, has introduced a bill to raise to $25,000 the limit of $10,000 to each individual borrower. I think that should be done, because land values have increased enormously since the law was enacted, and now there are plenty of farmers in the country owning farms worth $50,000, and I see no reason why they should not be allowed the advantage of the system.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Some of the farm organizations have recently taken a census of the farmers on that subject and the majority have voted in favor of an increase of the amount that might be loaned to $25,000. I have not been entirely satisfied in my own mind that that was a wise thing. Perhaps it is. I have come to no definite conclusion, but this thought has occurred to me.

It necessarily follows that there is a limit on the amount of money which can be raised for this specific purpose. It has seemed to me, assuming that to be so, that it would be a good deal better to loan $25,000 to three men than to loan $25,000 to one man. I realize that there are many men who would like to have $25,000, but I have been just a little bit fearful that if that amount were advanced it would be the big farmer who would get the benefit of the farm loan bill and not the small farmer. If I am wrong about that, I should like to be set right.

Mr. FLETCHER. My idea is that there ought to be found money enough under this system to serve all those actually cultivating farms and making that their business or occupation. Of course, if we can not get the money and it is impossible to raise sufficient funds to make the loans that are applied for and needed, then, I think, the Senator is perhaps correct in what I assume to be his present view, that we ought to loan that to the small farmer and allow the big operator to go into the commercial world, like other business men, and find his money there.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the position of the Federal Farm Loan Board on the matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. My understanding is that the bill was referred to a subcommittee, and the subcommittee called the members of the Farm Loan Board before it, and they took the position that it would not be wise now to increase the limit. They did so for the very reason indicated by the Senator from Ohio, that there is difficulty at this time in finding sufficient funds to meet the needs of those applying for loans.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the statement by the Senator is correct. I heard the testimony given by them before the subcommittee, but they have heretofore twice recommended the increase.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I think it will eventually come, and I am not so certain that it should not come now. I have prepared a bill which, in my judgment, will solve the problem. That bill was introduced, and is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have asked for its reference to a subcommittee, and we propose to go into hearings on it. It provides that short-time negotiable paper having farm-loan bonds attached as collateral security shall be eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve banks.

What does that mean? It means that the instant that is written into our law the banks themselves all over the country will be calling for these farm-loan bonds. They can use them for reserve. They can use them as money, because if we make them eligible for rediscount the transaction would simply be this: You would take your note to a bank, a member of the Federal reserve system, with a farm-loan bond attached as collateral security to the amount of the note. That member bank can then take it to a Federal reserve bank and get Federal reserve notes for it. Therefore, the banks themselves will want to buy the farm-loan bonds. It at once creates a demand and a market for the bonds, practically unlimited, in addition to the demand and the market which we now have.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator how the Federal Reserve Board stands on that proposition?

Mr. FLETCHER. They have so far advised against it. I hope to convert them, but I do not know whether I can or not. Thus far they think it is not a liquid paper, and they base their position upon its lack of liquidity.

I will say to the Senator that I am prepared to meet that proposition. I am not going into an argument of the question this afternoon, however. We have simply branched off upon it for the moment. It is important, and important in this very connection, and I hope to show and expect to show that negotiable notes with farm-loan bonds as collateral are just as liquid, certainly just as safe and just as secure, as a promissory note which I might make to the Senator from Iowa for $500 in the purchase of a horse from him. Why not?

The situation is perfectly absurd when you come to think about it. Under the present practice and system and laws, if I buy a horse from the Senator for $500 and give him my note, he can take that note to his bank and that member bank can send that note to the Federal Reserve Bank and get reserve notes for it. I might sell that horse the next week to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He might part with the horse, trade it off to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] for an automobile. The horse is then gone. The theory that my note originally given is to be made good by the sale of that horse is ridiculous. There is no security in connection with it.

The whole proposition is that the member bank takes the responsibility when it indorses that note and sends it up to the Federal Reserve Bank for rediscount. That note is to be paid first by the member bank when it falls due. It looks to me and to my indorser, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], for instance, to make good that note, and has no regard whatever for the horse that originally entered into the transaction. The horse has disappeared.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I hope when the Senator comes to look over his remarks he will change the figure a little. I do not wish to be charged in the Record with trading a horse for an automobile. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall try to make that satisfactory to the Senator. I ought to have changed that around and had the automobile come from the other direction, since the Senator from Idaho is so fond of horseback riding and appreciates a good horse. I am sure he would not trade a $500 horse to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] for any automobile.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator's argument, however, go a little too far; and is it not destructive of the theory of commercial paper entirely, because the Senator supposes that the validity or the strength of the note rests upon the article, in this instance the horse, for which the note was given? The Senator knows that commercial products and commodities are purchased and notes or acceptances are executed and the commodities are destroyed or consumed. Nevertheless, the consumption of the commodity does not diminish the security, so far as the Federal reserve bank is concerned, because they look to the member bank which guarantees the note in payment.

It occurs to me that the Senator in using his illustration seems to stress too much the article which is in existence at one time, in one instance the horse and in another instance a commercial commodity, and does not give sufficient consideration to the maker of the note or the drawer of the draft or the bank itself, which guarantees the payment.

May I further call the Senator's attention, for my own information, to this query. It seems to me the Senator's argument with respect to farm paper and mortgages is not quite accurate if he bases his contention upon long-time paper. There is but little liquidity to a mortgage upon real estate extending over a period of five years, but a note for which a mortgage is given as security and which is due in a few months would possess liquidity that a 5-year note and a 5-year mortgage would not possess. Does the Senator distinguish between the long-time mortgages and short-time paper?

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly. I am referring now to short-time paper. Long-time accommodation is provided for under the system where the mortgages are made payable at the rate of 1 per cent per annum on the principal and the interest at 5½ per cent. That extends over a period of 35 years, say. Those are the provisions for long-time accommodations; but now I am interested in raising money whereby these loans can be made, and the money is to be raised by the sale of the farm-loan bonds issued against those mortgages.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

Mr. FLETCHER. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. Every issue by every bank is guaranteed by every other bank. The issue of one bank is just as valid and just as good as the issue of another bank anywhere in the country. The rate of interest is the same, the terms are the same, and every farm-loan bank among the whole 12 guarantee the issue of every other bank so that the bonds are perfectly good and in every way secured, no matter what bank issues them.

In my judgment there is no more sound security offered to the public in the country than these farm-loan bonds issued by authority of the board by the Federal land banks. They have back of them the mortgages that are given upon land at 50 per cent of the value of those lands appraised by the Government. They have back of them the bank that issues the bonds as well as the other 11 Federal land banks throughout the country. They have back of them in addition to that the obligation of the local Farm Loan Association and in addition to that the obligation of the individual borrower. If there is any security that is sound and safe in this country, it is the Federal farm-land bank bonds, known as farm-loan bonds.

I propose to attach that, not to a note running over five or six years at all, but to the 60 or 90 day note. I suggest that in answer to the query of the Senator from Utah. I propose to make that paper 60 or 90 days or 6 months, not over 6 months, so that it is liquid paper, just as liquid as the note given for the horse in the instance I have mentioned. It is a note given for a debt secured by the farm-loan bond attached to it, which is the very safest security that could be given, it seems to me, in any transaction. It certainly is a safer transaction for the bank to take a note secured by farm-loan bonds for the face value of the note than it is to take a note that arises out of the purchase and sale of a lot of goods or a horse, as I have indicated.

I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, what we should like to do would be to accommodate as many borrowers as possible. In a conversation to-day with a member of a farm-land bank he stated to me that out of $40,000,000 of bonds recently issued, the amount allotted to some of the branches would not realize over $10,000 per county.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the very trouble I am trying to cure, and if Congress will pass the bill which I have introduced and which is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency, a note having these bonds as collateral will be made eligible to rediscount in the Federal reserve bank, and then we will get the money, because the bonds will be readily sold and the demand will be many times extended over and over again. There will be no limit practically to the demand for those bonds. Every bank in the country will want them and seek them. We will have also the same people who are now willing to buy the bonds, the farmers themselves where they have the money to invest, and others who have money to invest, still purchasing those bonds, and in addition to that we will create a market coextensive with the limits of the country, and capital everywhere will be seeking these bonds. It is the proceeds of those bonds that are loaned to farmers under the farm loan act. The Federal land bank can not make loans unless it has money, and it can only get money by the sale of the bonds. If we create a demand for those bonds, if we create a market for those bonds, we at once solve the problem of selling the bonds, and we shall at once have provided a fund which will be ample to meet the needs of the farmers of the country.

Notwithstanding the splendid work which the Federal Farm Loan Board has done thus far and the magnificent results therefrom, notwithstanding the fact that the farmers of the country for the first time in their lives, in the history of the country, have already obtained what appears to be the large sum of $434,362,074 at 5 per cent, with the privilege of paying off the principal at the rate of 1 per cent per annum—notwithstanding that great achievement, when we remember that the mortgages on the farms in this country to-day amount to more than $4,000,000,000, it may readily be seen that the surface has scarcely been scratched in the administration of the Federal farm loan act. We have not even begun to meet the needs of agriculture. We can not meet those needs unless we find a market for the farm-loan bonds. When we pass this legislation I have proposed, we shall have a demand, we shall have a market for these bonds, and we shall be able to sell the bonds and thus to procure the money with which to make the loans.

It is a shame that we can not at least raise enough money to pay off the farm mortgages, which are now bearing from 8 and 10 to 20 per cent, including commissions and other charges and costs, and allow the farmers who are burdened with these high-interest rates to get their money at 5½ per cent under the Federal farm loan act. That is a question to be thoroughly considered. When it is considered I believe Senators will agree that we must solve the problem in that way; that we must create a market for the bonds in order that they may be readily sold and in order that ample funds may be on hand to be loaned by the Farm Loan Board and thus to meet the demands of agriculture. The board can not accommodate the applications which are now on file with them; they can not begin to pay off the mortgages on the farms in this country to-day. They are hampered for lack of funds. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] recently introduced a measure whereby there was provided $50,000,000 additional. That legislation has helped to some extent; but that is only a small amount, comparatively. We realize that, as I have said, when we remember that the farmers of the United States themselves are now carrying mortgages to an amount of over $4,000,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida if in his study of this question he has reached a conclusion as to a safe ratio between farm values and farm loans that might be maintained in this country?

Mr. FLETCHER. I find no very serious objection to the present ratio adopted under the act, and that is 50 per cent of the actual value of the land and 20 per cent of the improvements thereon. That is the basis upon which the act is now being administered, and it certainly ought to be safe, it seems to me. So far the Farm Loan Board are having no trouble about collecting all of the amounts due them. I do not believe they have had any foreclosure suits or any defaults worth mentioning, and they have had but very few requests for extensions, according to my information.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] suggests that tax assessments would be a good basis for valuations on which to make loans. Of course, the assessment is made by State authority, and it might not be quite feasible to accept it. In some instances the assessment is away below the value; it is, I think, about one-third of the value of the land, usually. Farm land is ordinarily assessed at something like one-third of its value in a good many of the States and counties. However, in the case of loans under the farm loan act the Farm Loan Board appoints appraisers of the land. They are the representatives of the Government, the loaning authority. They go out and look at the land; they actually go upon it and examine it and appraise it; and it is upon the basis of that appraisement that the loans are made. The agents of the party making the loan themselves estimate the value of the land under the present system. If they find a farm is worth $1,000 they say to the owner, "We will loan you $500." It does seem that that ought to be safe. They do not accept the estimate of the local association or of the borrower or of any committee. They themselves send their own appraisers who appraise the value of the farm.

Mr. KING. However, it must be conceded that those appraisers are usually, and, indeed, always residents of the State in which they are appointed and of the districts which they represent, and too often, perhaps, they may respond to the inflated ideas as to the value of property which are possessed by its owners and by the local communities; but, in the main, I agree with the Senator from Florida that the appraisements have been very fair, and the Government is not in a position to sustain any losses.

If the Senator from Florida will pardon me, if it is not a digression from the point he is making, I should like the Senator's view as to whether or not the Government should issue any more tax-exempt securities. I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that recently, when I was in New York, I was told that many of the large real estate holders, some of the Astors and Vanderbilts, were disposing of their real estate because of the heavy burden of taxation—municipal, State, and otherwise—and were using the proceeds derived from the sale to purchase tax-exempt securities. The Senator from Florida will realize that if that policy shall be continued and we continue to issue municipal, State, and national tax-exempt securities we shall soon have, perhaps, from thirty to forty billion dollars of tax-exempt securities.

They will be accumulated in the hands of the rich, who will dispose of real estate and other property subject to taxation and invest in tax-exempt securities, and thus vast sums will be withdrawn from taxation.

Does the Senator think that we ought to continue the policy of issuing tax-exempt securities? Does he not think that perhaps we ought to appeal to the States, and, if they fail to respond, then to amend the Constitution of the United States, so that they may not issue tax-exempt securities, at least securities that would be exempt from Federal taxation, to the end that there shall not drift into the hands of the rich billions and tens of billions of property which will be exempt from taxation, thereby imposing the burden of maintaining the States and the National Government upon what the French would call the bourgeoisie class.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say in answer to the Senator, although his suggestion is quite aside from the line of argument that I had in mind, that I think perhaps we will have to take steps to limit the issuance of tax-exempt securities in this country. I know of no way by which we can prevent the States from doing as they please about it except by some constitutional amendment, and perhaps it will have to be reached in that manner, but we are not able now to sell the farm-loan bonds in sufficient quantities to supply the needs of the farmers. I do not see that we are being oppressed very greatly by capitalists who invest in farm-loan bonds which are tax exempt. As I have said, we are having difficulty in selling the bonds in sufficient quantities, and I do not know that we have any right to complain or criticize as to that feature of the bonds issued under the farm loan act.

I will say further that, whatever may be done in that connection hereafter, so far as relieving the bond issues from tax exemption of any sort is concerned, the farm-loan bonds ought to be the last ones from which the privilege of exemption should be taken away, because it is only by reason of the fact that they are tax exempt they are sold at the low rate at which they are sold; and that means that the borrower is able to get his money at the low rate for which he now gets it. If we at once relieve the bonds of the tax-exempt feature the farmers of the country must pay a higher rate of interest on their loans.

Speaking generally, there are two sides to the question, and we will hear very strong arguments on both sides when the subject is reached.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I had not intended to say anything at all concerning the exempt feature, Mr. President, but I will suggest that the great trouble now is the exemption of invisible property, such as notes, mortgages, trust funds, shares in stock and bonds. We are struggling in the State of Georgia now, where there is a deficit of about $3,000,000, to provide a stamp tax to compel those hidden securities to come from their places of concealment and pay their taxes.

As to the suggestion made by my friend the Senator from Utah—

Mr. KING. I will ask the Senator to bear in mind that I expressed no opinion.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I said "suggestion"—I should like to say to him, as a matter of actual experience, that when I was a young lawyer practicing my profession the farmers had no way of borrowing money at all, except from cotton factors, to whom they had to give mortgages on their property, generally on their land, at the rate of interest which was then permissible, running as high as 12 per cent. In addition thereto, they had to sign what was called a cotton contract to send one bale of cotton for each $10 advanced, and in default of sending a bale of cotton for each $10 borrowed they had to pay a dollar and a half storage and commission, just as if the bale of cotton had been shipped, stored, and sold. Consequently the interest charge amounted to away over 20 per cent.

Just at that time the Corbin Banking Co., of New York, for instance, came down into the South with a land-loan banking system, a farm-mortgage system. I represented that company in my local territory. One of the requirements of the company was not to lend more than a certain amount above the estimate which the taxpayer had been previously placing upon his land for purposes of taxation, conclusively presuming that he would not return it for taxation at a higher value than was justified by the circumstances.

I will say, Mr. President, for the information of Senators, and in support of what the Senator from Florida is saying, that having represented that company for years and loaned out thousands and thousands and thousands of dollars of its money on that basis, I never knew it to lose a single loan, not one; and the company was of great benefit to the farmers, because they got money at about 8 per cent, plus the necessary expense of recording the mortgage.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very glad the Senator has given us that information. Now, of course, those were not unreasonable terms. The fact is, as I have numerous letters in my office to show, that the farmers are paying all the way from 8 to 20 per cent on loans; but under this system those same farmers ought to get their money at 5½ per cent, with no commissions to be added, no fees, no charges except some small items for abstracts of title.

But, Mr. President, I must hurry on, because there are other Senators who desire to discuss this bill.

There is another proposed measure, which I have introduced and to which I would invite the Senate's attention, now before the Banking and Currency Committee, which would effect some economy. We hear very much in this Chamber about economy, and we are often told that it is very important that we should curtail expenditures, and we have no evidence that the meaning of the word economy is understood. The bill that I mention now proposes to save the Government at least $25,000 a year, and to do so without any harm or injury or crippling to any service. I have introduced this bill to change the membership of the Farm Loan Board from four members, as now constituted, together with the Secretary of the Treasury ex officio chairman, to two members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the Secretary of the Treasury still to be ex officio chairman, and adding the Secretary of Agriculture as an ex officio member, so that the board would be composed of two active members instead of four, and would have the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture as ex officio members without additional compensation.

Each of the members of the Farm Loan Board to-day receives a salary of $10,000 per annum. In my judgment the provision for four members originally was entirely wise and proper; but the board have organized the system. They have put the law into effect. They had to go out over the country and divide the whole country into 12 distinct districts. They have done all that. The Federal land banks are all established and functioning. Their agencies and means of carrying on the business are all systematized and operating, and there is no longer need of four members to sit in the office here in Washington, each drawing $10,000 per annum, with 35 or 40 clerks here just to supervise the operations of the Federal land banks and sell the bonds. They do not sell the bonds in fact. The first sale of bonds they negotiated through a syndicate. I believe the syndicate was paid a commission to sell the bonds. They supervise the sale of the bonds. They have not been able to sell the last $40,000,000 that they offered. I believe the Senator from South Carolina said that they had sold $36,000,000 of them, or about that; but in my judgment that board could be limited to two active members here in Washington, together with the clerks that they require, instead of four, with each member now having a crowd of clerks around him looking after his particular branch of the work. That would save you $25,000 per annum.

If you want to economize, there is an opportunity to evidence a little of that desire, and I am saying this not because of any antagonism that I have to the board or any member of the board. On the contrary, I have the highest esteem for them. I regard them as my personal friends. I am proud so to regard them. I certainly have no ill will toward any member of that board; I never have had; and I want to see that work continued without being in any way hampered or hindered. I do believe firmly, however, that there is no need of four members of that board here in Washington now, after this system is thoroughly organized and in thoroughly successful operation. That measure is pending.

Now, Mr. President, we have done much—not too much, in fact not enough—through the great Department of Agriculture to promote production, to encourage and help the farmers of the country. They are doing all right so far as production is concerned, but it is of no use to raise the produce, to create truck and farm products, and have them rot in the fields. Some years ago I endeavored to cure that trouble to some extent by an effort to extend the use of the parcel-post system so as to promote direct dealing between producers and consumers.

The Post Office Department were given a small appropriation and made some experiments, and they accomplished some good results in that direction. The last Congress cut off that appropriation, so that those experiments are not being carried on; but certain benefits developed from them, and there has been a certain amount of direct dealing carried on between producers and consumers, and that helps some. It helps toward the solution of the marketing question. The great problem now is the problem of distribution. That is the problem with which agriculture is confronted in this country, and that is the problem we must solve—the problem of distribution.

I am in favor of establishing an agency such as the corporation proposed in this bill, in the hope and with the belief that such an agency will tend very largely toward the solution of our problem of distribution. That corporation could form co-operative agencies throughout the various States. Those agencies could ascertain the quantities of farm products offered for sale, the quantities that could be assembled at centers here and there over the country, and then the corporation could find just where those products were wanted, upon what terms they would be taken, and direct their movement accordingly. It could harmonize and work with the International Institute of Agriculture, with headquarters at Rome, Italy. That institute gathers information all over the world. It knows from time to time precisely what farm products are produced in this country and in that country, where there is a surplus, and where there is a shortage. It knows as to prices; it knows as to the wants and needs of people in various countries respecting the different kinds of farm products; and if it were in touch with a corporation on this side, such as would be created by this bill, these products could be moved to the markets where there was demand for them, where there was need for them, and they could be kept out of and away from fields where there was already a surplus.

In my judgment, a great deal could be accomplished in this direction, and we never were in a better position to try it than to-day. In the first place, we have the ships. Those ships could be sent to every port in Christendom, if necessary. We could send those ships, with cargoes of such products as might be selected for the various markets, to United Kingdom and Continental ports, send them to Mediterranean ports, send them to South Africa, send them to the Orient through the Panama Canal, carrying the products of America to the waiting markets overseas. I can see great possibilities for a work of that kind.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether, in his general indorsement of the measure now before us, he indorses that provision of the bill which puts the Government of the United States into the field as a buyer and as a seller—as a buyer in competition with all other buyers and exporters, as a seller in competition with all other sellers, whether they be sellers in the domestic market or sellers abroad?

If the Senator approves of that extreme socialistic and paternalistic policy, does not the Senator believe that the effect undoubtedly would be to drive from the field domestic buyers and sellers of agricultural products as well as foreign buyers and sellers—that is, those who are purchasing for export purposes? Does the Senator intend to give his general indorsement to that provision of the bill, as well as to the other provisions which call for the organization of this corporation to extend credits?

Mr. FLETCHER. No, Mr. President; I am not in favor of shutting out buyers who come here from abroad or domestic buyers. I am not in favor of limiting markets at all. On the contrary, it seems to me that the whole purpose of this bill and the whole idea back of it and the whole intent of the corporation if it properly pursues its duties will be to take care of the surplus production in this country, to increase the number of buyers and extend the field for distribution of these products, not to limit or cut off or interfere with other buyers and other dispositions that might be made of the domestic requirements at all, but to take care of the surplus production. We are producing a large surplus of agricultural products—not merely enough, for instance, for home consumption, but a surplus that must find markets in foreign countries—and the operation of this corporation will be with reference to foreign markets, to export products; in other words, dealing with our surplus. It will increase the number of agencies, perhaps, that might buy farm products to that extent, and there may be a certain amount of competition; but it will not be competition that will run out of the field any operators in our domestic markets.

Mr. KING. Then, Mr. President, as I interpret the position of the Senator, he does approve of the Government becoming a buyer and seller of agricultural products, but he attempts to limit it, as I understand his position, to the purchase and sale of those products which he denominates "surplus."

If that is the position of the Senator, may I suggest to him for his consideration, if he has not already considered it, that whenever the Government of the United States enters into the field for the purpose of buying and selling, it may not draw a dividing line and say, "On this side of the line it is domestic and on that side of the line the product is for export." The moment the Government goes into the buying, whether it announces that it is buying only for export purposes or not, it affects the entire market; and the experience has been that when the Government has gone into the market for the purpose of purchasing, it has usually affected the market disastrously to the producer.

Now, I am in favor of some sort of a measure that may facilitate the giving of credit to agriculturists, but I am not in favor of the Government of the United States becoming a buyer and a seller. If the Government of the United States should go into the market now and become a buyer and seller of agricultural products, the Senator must see that the effect would be to drive out of the market all of the instrumentalities now existing which have been built up by business men to aid in the exchange and sale in a domestic way and in a foreign way of agricultural products, and the Government in the end would be compelled to be the sole buyer and the sole seller of all of the agricultural products of the United States. It would fix the prices, domestic prices and foreign prices, because the prices which the Government thought it would sell for abroad would reflect the prices at home, and in the end you would have a great Government fixing the prices of products, both those consumed and those sold, and you would compel the Government in the end to take over all of the agricultural products of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, of course if all those things should happen, if I could see any reasonable prospect of their happening, under this bill, I would be opposed to the bill. But I do not agree with the Senator in his conclusions. I do believe this corporation ought to have authority to buy and they ought to have authority to sell those products in foreign markets, not in this country, but abroad; and they ought to be empowered to act as agents for purchasers and sellers here and as agents of the producer to transact the business in foreign markets. They ought to be able to extend credits and to guarantee transactions in such sort that this surplus can be disposed of in foreign markets, because, after all, as I said, the great problem confronting agriculture in this country is the problem of distribution, and I think this measure will very largely tend to solve that problem.

It may not accomplish all we expect and desire. It is not a permanent thing. Its life is for five years, and, of course, it is for Congress to say, at the end of that time, whether the work shall be continued or not, and the corporation kept alive. But it is limited to five years, to meet the present condition arising out of the world upheaval which has brought about this demoralization of markets and this distress to agriculture. As I said, it may not do all we hope it will do, but we recall that in "Measure for Measure" Isabella, when asked to help save her brother, answered:

"Alas! What poor ability's in me to do him good?"

To which Lucio replied, "Assay the power you have."

We may not have the ability, we may not have the foresight and the wisdom, or the power, even, to legislate so as to remedy this situation, but we can at least do what is in our power to relieve conditions, and that, I think, we should do.

I ask leave, Mr. President, to have printed as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Florida Times Union.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed, as follows:

HELPING THE FARMER HELPS OTHERS.

"Just now there is a nation-wide interest in the farmer to be seen in the Government consideration more than ever before of the needs of the tillers of the soil. 'Why,' ask some people, 'should the farmer be singled out for State or National consideration and assistance more than any other class of toilers?' Because helping the farmer helps all others. Clear the stream at its source and it is possible for the water to be pure and healthful. And is it not true that agriculture is the source of life, physically and commercially?"

"Mr. Herbert W. Forster, writing in the New York Times, tells of the 'farms' silver lining,' due to enormous crops, plenty of work for all who want employment on the farms, and at rates of wages more than fair to worker and employer than prevailed during several years past. After recounting what he saw during a recent trip through the great agricultural section of the West and referring to Government aid for financing the movement to market at home and abroad of these generous crops of the current year Mr. Forster says:

"Here are the wider aspects of the agricultural recovery that justify its raising a general economic hopefulness. There is its effect on the railroads. A big crop necessitates heavy transportation. The railroad men say they have the rolling stock on hand to carry it in a short time, and they add that this stimulus to transportation will help materially in pulling them out of the depression. The bankers and business men at the cattle pool conference held in Chicago a little while ago stated that if a large part of the crop were marketable within the next three months, as the market indicates it will be, it would help to relieve the whole financial situation throughout the country.

"Following this the writer quoted goes on to show how in ways other than those just mentioned helping the farmer helps others. He says:

"The combination of cheap labor, which has reduced the cost of production, and the size of the crops will bring the farmer large net returns this year. The farmer constitutes a vast buying public, and when he gets the money for his harvest he, who has also been on a buyers' strike, will declare the strike off and become a lively consumer once more. This is bound to make itself felt advantageously in all branches of industry, and is considered the most encouraging phase of the outlook. 'What helps the farmer helps everybody' is being put to the test, and it looks as though it were going to ring true.

"Just for a moment stop and consider what it would mean to all of us if suddenly, or even by slow degrees, the farmer should be deserted and allowed to bear his burdens unaided. There would be not only famine but all forms of enterprise and business would halt and work cease in proportion to the inactivity on the farms. Economically as well as physically all would suffer. The converse is equally true, that the activity and prosperity of the farmer precedes and presages activity in business and its prosperous conditions as well as promotes the general welfare. Therefore reasonable help for the farmer is help for all people."

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the funding of the foreign debt were solely a question of judgment with reference to finance or as to proper dealing with securities, I should not hesitate to select the Secretary of the Treasury as the man to whom should be given authority to deal with that subject. But the foreign debt involves much more than that. I do not know of any question which has so much to do with our relations with foreign Governments as the proper adjustment of our foreign debt. I do not know of any question which has so much to do with our economic domestic affairs as its proper disposition. Indeed, it touches almost every question with which the Congress could have to do just at this particular juncture of affairs. It necessarily follows that upon such a subject we must have opinions. Indeed, we are compelled to have opinions and are under obligation to urge them. It would be extraordinary for the Congress to abdicate its authority, surrender its judgment and its discretion, and delegate undefined power over this subject to one particular individual, regardless of the ability, the acknowledged standing in character, and the high patriotism of the man to whom that delegation of power was to be given.

Our foreign debt at this time amounts to about $11,000,000,000. We have loaned to different Governments of Europe about $10,000,000,000, and there is now unpaid interest upon the loans of nearly $1,000,000,000. So the foreign debt represents about $11,000,000,000. In addition to that, we have made loans to about $5,000,000,000 in the way of loans on securities by individuals or corporations.

Mr. Reynolds, the Chicago banker, in an address made some weeks ago, said:

The extent to which European nations have been securing capital in the American market may not be fully comprehended. During the period 1915-1920 foreign loans floated through American bankers aggregated some $5,000,000,000. Direct loans by the Federal Government to European nations amounted to some $10,000,000,000. At the present time the unfunded debt of Europe probably amounts to somewhere between $3,500,000,000 and $4,000,000,000. In all, these figures represent an export of something like nineteen billions of capital.

Mr. Reynolds, continuing his remarks along the line indicated by the paragraph just read, said:

To show the significance of these figures a comparison may be noted. During the period 1915-1920 the total reported issues of securities—railroad and traction, industrial, municipal, and State, and those put out by the Federal Government—amounted to $43,500,000,000. Of that total, $15,000,000,000 went to Europe. Europeans received three billions more than were given to all American railroads, traction companies, and industries combined. They received as much as these with State and municipal issues added.

Justification for proposals to furnish Europe with even more capital is sought in the plea that the fortunes of the people of the United States are tied up with those of Europe. Failure, distress, and disaster there will mean failure, distress, and disaster here. The view is urged that American goods, particularly raw materials, must be sold to Europeans not only in order to relieve the American market but also to furnish Europe the materials on which to work in the process of economic rehabilitation. Any proposal to furnish Europe with more capital should receive the closest scrutiny.

In many statements regarding the subject of exporting capital, the idea seems to be prevalent that money is the only form of capital. If the United States makes loans to France and the proceeds of the loans are expended in the United States it is felt that Americans will be safe because the money is still here. But in such case they have parted with capital goods which have been paid for with their own funds. They will receive for these capital goods the customary evidences of debt—bonds or notes which draw interest. This is as truly an export of capital as if gold had been sent abroad, and Americans have identical evidence in either case. American capital resources have been depleted to the same extent in either case.

That has all taken place since 1915. In six years we have exported capital from this country to foreign Governments to the extent, as Mr. Reynolds puts it, of about $19,000,000,000. But that does not represent, by any means, all the capital which we have exported.

I have before me a statement purporting to give the donations which have been made by this country to Europe since 1915, and up to January 16, 1921, they aggregate $2,393,418,567.80. It may be interesting, Mr. President, to give the leading items making up that total.

The figures are as follows:

Knights of Columbus	$8,389,600.00
Jewish Welfare Board	670,000.00
Young Women's Christian Association	4,158,145.70
Young Men's Christian Association	25,591,413.49
Joint Distribution Committee	24,000,000.00
Sun Tobacco Fund	442,000.00
Reported by National Information Bureau: American Relief Administration, European Children's Fund, war chests, smaller organizations	825,000,000.00
Other war relief groups (N. Y. Bureau)	20,000,000.00
American Red Cross	217,265,588.76
Salvation Army	6,546,846.95
American Library Association (estimated)	300,000.00
European Relief Council (Herbert Hoover, chairman) (estimated)	30,000,000.00
American Food Administration, American Relief Commission (estimated)	100,000,000.00
Individual gifts, food, money, goods, 1914-1918 (estimated)	500,000,000.00
Societies, associations, etc., now out of existence, no records (estimated)	500,000,000.00
Money orders sent to friends in warring countries (from Postmaster General's fiscal reports for 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918)	131,054,973.00

They aggregate, as I have said, $2,393,418,567.80.

We have exported to Europe in six years, therefore, from twenty to twenty-one billion of capital. That is nearly or quite two-thirds of the entire reparation claims assessed against Germany, which she is to have 40 years to pay. In six years we have either loaned or donated to European powers that vast and almost inconceivable sum of capital. We are now confronted with the proposition, earnestly presented and ably argued by certain economists and financiers, that the United States can not reabsorb, as it were, any part of this $21,000,000,000 of capital without great detriment to the financial fabric. A country which has depleted itself in six years of the stupendous sum of $21,000,000,000, we are informed, is not in a position to take any considerable portion of it back lest it disarrange and disorganize the whole of our financial and economic structure.

Those who undertake to support that proposition and to present it to the lay mind have a very great task before them. It is a difficult task which they have assumed to thus prove that a country parting with such a vast sum of capital could not, in the practical working out of international and domestic finance, find room for the safe use of a part of the vast capital with which it has parted. Those who undertake to show this will be met with many obstacles, the most conclusive of which is that it is unreasonable. There may be something in the mysterious operations and workings of finance which the ordinary man can not comprehend, but it will have to be revealed in an unmistakable fashion before it will be accepted by the American people, who are now in need of capital.

Mr. President, the first propaganda organized with some considerable force and effect, with reference to the foreign debt, was to cancel it entirely. There is no doubt where that originated. It did not originate in this country, although it was earnestly advocated by those who always represent in this country what foreign interests want. But that proposition was very successfully and conclusively vetoed by President Wilson. When the proposition was presented to him—and for a long time it was denied abroad it had been presented—his letter in response to the subject was conclusive, and, in my judgment, it correctly interpreted the views of the people of this country. He advised in courteous but unmistakable terms that the debt would not be canceled; on the other hand, that we should expect payment, and payment of the entire amount.

The next proposition, after the question of the cancellation of the debt had been disposed of, was the funding of the debt for a long period of time and deferring the payment of the interest for 12 or 15 years. Of course there are a great many people who advocate the funding of the debt for a long period of time and the deferring of the payment of interest who were not associated with those who advocated cancellation and who do not believe in the cancellation of the debt; but the moving power for the funding of the debt and the deferring of the interest for 15 years was the same power which initiated the movement for the cancellation of the debt.

After it was ascertained that it was impossible to cancel the debt, the next proposition was that of funding it and deferring payment of interest until such time as it was believed that the American people as a people could be brought to the conclusion that it ought to be canceled. One of the most noted of the London papers in discussing the question said:

It perhaps is not within reason to expect the American people all at once to be converted to this very practical application of world solidarity.

That is to say, the cancellation of the debt, the subject they were discussing.

In a London dispatch, printed in the New York World under date of November 11, 1920, it was said:

Finance officials here would like to popularize the idea that the interallied war loans should not be considered at all, but treated as war expenditures and wiped off the slate.

If not now, later.

The two propositions are kindred in the source from which they sprang, and while as they move forward they have different advocates, the origin in my judgment is the same.

So long as the masses in Europe are led to believe, first, that Germany can pay all the expenses of the war and rehabilitate them financially and economically, and, secondly, that the United States will not only cancel the debt ultimately but will in the meantime continue the loan, either publicly or through private corporations, and donate millions to feed them, the nationals of Europe are not going to work. It has a perfectly demoralizing effect upon them. They have been educated to that belief to a very great extent. Two campaigns have been made in two of the leading nations of Europe, based largely upon that theory. The result of it is, as we are informed, that outside of a limited area in Europe the people are laboring under the belief that that is to be the ultimate program.

I read from an interview given out by John M. Glenn, secretary of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, who has just returned from Europe a few days ago, in which he said:

Germany is the only European country that is working to any extent. Practically the rest of them are loafing. They want the United States to give them more money so they can go out and play some more. England needs a Wellington, France a Napoleon, and Italy a Garibaldi to make them go back to work. Apparently there is no one working in Europe but the Germans. I talked with a prominent American woolen manufacturer who had motored all over Britain and found loafing to be general. All the people I met at the International Chamber of Commerce spoke of the activity of Germany getting out production. Meanwhile the allied nations appeared to be sitting around waiting for the reparations to be handed out.

Of course, such statements are always criticized by certain people, but plenty of evidence could be gathered to the effect that they are refusing to go back to work; that they have refused to go back to work; and that they seem to be laboring, either consciously or unconsciously, under the supposition that somehow and in some way they are to be taken care of whatever the crisis may come to be.

At the present time there is no legal obstacle that I know of to interfere with the collection of this debt or the interest upon it. Of course, I realize perfectly, when I say the collection of the debt, that the entire debt could not be paid at once. I do insist, however, that the interest should be collected, certainly from some of the leading powers. I shall undertake to show in a few moments all they need to do is to turn some of the means which they have at their command into the channel of paying their debts instead of utilizing it in a manner which is neither beneficial to them nor anyone else.

But there is, as I said, at this time no reason, nothing standing in the way of an urgent but courteous demand that the debts and the interest be taken care of. Whatever change there would have to be in the way of form of the debt can be had under law now in existence. As pointed out by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] very clearly a few days ago, there is sufficient authority already to deal with the debt under present laws if we are willing to come within the two limitations with reference to the interest and the length of the bond—two limitations which are wise.

I was interested to read a few days ago an earnest statement in the eastern press to the effect that until Congress should have granted this power and laws should have been enacted the interest upon this debt could not be collected. If there is any reason why it can not be collected at this time, it is not a legal inhibition but a mere question of policy or of incapacity to realize. It is not by reason of any want of authority. The debt, in other words, is just as binding, just as obligatory, and the evidence of it is just as plain and just as conclusive as if it were in the form of a bond.

One of the arguments with which we meet with reference to the debt is that owing to the sacrifices which the foreign nations made and the comparatively small sacrifices which we made, as it is argued, we should forgive the entire debt. As one writer has said, instead of Europe owing us, we really owe Europe. That is the basis really upon which they proceed to argue that the debt should either be canceled or deferred to such time as it might be disposed of in that way.

Do we owe Europe, Mr. President? I have called attention to the fact that we have exported to Europe in the last five or six years about $20,000,000,000 or $21,000,000,000 of capital. The United States did not claim as a result of the war a single dollar for reparations.

The United States has not claimed anything in the way of territory. She contributed of her capital, she contributed of her men, and under the circumstances under which we found conditions in Europe at the time we went into the war she contributed in a controlling way to the victory, and for that she has not claimed anything in return. She might well, according to the customs and practices of nations, have taken a different course. But we declined all spoils of war. Shall we now be called upon to contribute further by forgiving this entire debt? Neither conscience nor fair dealing, nor justice to our own people, nor the demands of humanity require any such course. Such a suggestion came from two sources; first, those whose sympathies are so keen for other peoples that they wholly lose sight of the rights of our own, and those whose interests are so keen as to private advantages that they overlook entirely the public interest.

The $33,000,000,000 of reparation which is to be paid by Germany is to be distributed among the nations of Europe. The United States claims no part of it. The vast amount of territory which was divided up at Versailles has been distributed among the European nations, and no man can estimate the value, either now or in the future, of the land and territory which was divided up among the powers by the treaty of Versailles. It is far beyond anything of value that has been estimated for in dollars and cents in the way of reparation. When you balance the account, taking into consideration that the United States has stepped aside from all division of reparation and territory, it is pretty difficult to sustain the proposition even as cold bookkeeping that we owe Europe instead of Europe owing us.

Let us look at this division of territory. If we leave Persia out of consideration for the present, we find that there was distributed to the English Government territory equal in area to the territory of Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, Utah, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas; a territory far larger in area than the original Thirteen Colonies; a territory consisting of more than 1,607,053 square miles and with 35,000,000 people. That is not taking into consideration Persia, which was practically distributed to England, neither does it undertake to estimate the incalculable mineral wealth which is found in these territories.

Scarcely less important was the distribution made to France. We ordinarily look upon that country as being a small country, with very small colonial holdings, but the territorial holdings of France outside of France proper are second only to that of Great Britain.

I have not the exact area or the precise extent of territory which France acquired by reason of the war. But we know of Kamerun, with an area of 166,489 square miles, to which should be added 107,270 square miles ceded to Germany by Caillaux in 1911. We know of German Togoland, with an area of 21,893 square miles; also Syria, with her population of 3,250,000 and a territorial area of 106,740 square miles, with great mineral wealth.

Of course, I am perfectly aware that some will say that some of these are merely covered by a mandate. I presume no one any longer contends that the mandate is anything but a camouflage for the real distribution of territory, according to the secret treaties which were made before we entered the war. It at least transpires that the mandates conform to the agreements in the secret treaties, and it also transpires that the territories are being dealt with under the mandates in the same way as they would be if they had been deeded in fee simple. I am frank to say that neither Mr. Wilson nor Gen. Smuts had this idea of a mandate in mind, but others had, and their opinions, in practice at least, have prevailed.

In addition, France has acquired as a result of the war some of the largest mineral deposits of the world. She has at this time more iron lands than the entire Continent and the United Kingdom combined. It has been stated by Mr. Simons, the noted journalist, that "France is prospectively the great iron nation of Europe." The population of her territorial holdings will easily reach 60,000,000.

So, Mr. President, in casting up the account it is difficult to sustain the proposition that we owe Europe. On the other hand, it clearly appears that the debt which is under discussion is a just debt and one which the American taxpayer has a right to assume will be paid in full. I venture the opinion that so far as the leading nations are concerned it will be paid in full. It would be much wiser and far more conducive to good understanding in the future if all parties concerned should accept the proposition that the debt is a valid one, both in conscience and in law, and that it must be paid as rapidly as may be practicable. All parties should accede to this proposition. If foreign nations are misled, it will be because they misled themselves.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is not the Senator familiar with the fact that many prominent foreigners have claimed, inasmuch as the World War was fought for a common purpose, was fought by them for three years before we went into it, that, therefore, the entire allied debt should be pooled, and that a great portion of the expense that was incurred before we entered the war we are morally bound to pay?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I am aware of that argument. That would involve, Mr. President, a question which I am not going to discuss to-day, and that is, how we came to go into the war and for what purpose we went into the war. Even then, after that was determined, assuming that it was a war in which we had a common cause and fought for a common object, the distribution of which I have been speaking would still be pertinent to that proposition.

It is often said, of course, that the foreign Governments are unable to pay. I have no doubt, Mr. President, those Governments are unable now to pay the entire debt, and no one desires, I presume, to urge it to the extent of embarrassing those countries beyond reason; but certainly the leading countries to which I refer—having them in mind all the time rather than the smaller countries—are able to take care of the interest. Any one who will study their budgets, the manner in which they are dealing with their money, and the method in which they are disposing of it, will have no trouble at all in coming to the conclusion that they can meet the interest upon their debts. I think also that no one will have trouble in coming to the conclusion that we in this country could absorb the amount of the interest which is due us without disrupting our financial fabric. Three days ago I read the following in the press dispatches from London:

Over nine billion dollars is deposited to current account in the banks at present, with a large proportion waiting investment.

I also read at the same time that England had loaned $50,000,000 to Argentina for the purpose of extending and building up her trade in South America. It is barely possible that we also, without wrecking our financial fabric, could take that same money and loan it to South American countries if it were necessary in order to look after our interests and transfer it to this continent to our benefit rather than to the benefit of a foreign power.

It is, of course, none of our concern and we should not censure any movement which England sees fit to make for the purpose of building up her foreign trade; it is in accordance with the English spirit; it is in accordance with national policy, and no one desires to object; but when we see these transactions going on we are less tolerant of the idea that those countries are unable to pay and that we ourselves would be unable to make use of the money if we had it. This article continues:

In order to attract this huge sum to industrial ventures the big interests are clamoring for a further reduction in the bank rate to 5 per cent. Financial experts say the way is clear for a big business revival, though the unprecedented heat and the vacation season is causing it to hang fire.

Labor Leader Clynes has announced that trade can now go full steam ahead as far as the workers are concerned and that the era of industrial disputes is ended.

The stock market is devoting close attention to the preliminaries of the Washington conference. It is agreed that if it is successful it will have a far-reaching effect on the world's finances.

The Financial Age, in its January 29, 1921, number, after reviewing this subject, says:

There is no doubt that the Allies are entirely solvent and willing to settle their indebtedness to the United States if pressed to do so.

Mr. President, all the leading financiers and economists do not agree with the proposition that we may not safely collect the interest which is due us from foreign Governments and absorb it. One of the most pronounced exponents of that view is Mr. Reynolds, the Chicago banker. He has been very outspoken in his views upon this question, and perhaps it may be worth while to insert them in the Record. He visited Washington some time ago, and the press reports announced him as occupying this position. I shall now quote from the Washington Herald, which ought to be in a position to know what takes place. That paper states:

Mincing no words, he [Reynolds] attacked as fallacious, chimerical, and destructive of American prosperity many of the schemes of domestic and foreign financing being urged upon the President by Wall Street interests. Reynolds pronounced unsound and injurious to American welfare projects for stimulation of an unnatural volume of foreign trade.

A plea to husband our resources for our own needs primarily was voiced by Reynolds in the course of an onslaught upon the proposals for extending additional credits to the debt-ridden countries of Europe, which, he said, would not revive trade but only increase a foreign debt to the United States that can be discharged eventually only in goods.

"Improvement in Europe is not worth buying at the price of America's impoverishment," said Reynolds when the discussion was at its height.

Nor did the Chicago banker hesitate to express, in the presence of the President and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, his disapproval of the administration plan to sell to the American public the bonds of the funded $10,000,000,000 allied debt to the United States. He opined that the bonds would find no extended market unless the United States were to guarantee them, which would be only adding a further complication to the existing situation.

The views of Reynolds, clashing not only with the notions of Cabinet members but the proposals of the eastern bankers, were echoed by many of the other financiers of the Middle West. In fact, there is good ground for stating that Reynolds uttered a declaration of independence of Chicago banks from the domination of the New York banking interests which are heavily interested in foreign financing.

In the address of Mr. Reynolds, from which I quoted in the beginning of my remarks, are some views particularly relevant to the point which I am now seeking to make. Certainly no one will underestimate the ability of Mr. Reynolds to deal with subjects like this. I freely acknowledge my reliance upon the judgment of other men in regard to the merely expert features of this subject, although I am frank to say I entertain some views of my own with reference to some of the general questions growing out of the subject. Mr. Reynolds says:

Reports indicate that the nations of continental Europe have made small progress in balancing their budgets. Deficits have accumulated. These nations must make serious efforts to improve public finances. This course involves stringent measures in the way of deflating inflated paper currencies. It also involves taxation of the most rigorous character. There must be retrenchment in public expenditures. Internal funding loans of greater proportions will doubtless be necessary to reduce floating debts—particularly to reduce debts to the State banks of issue, so as to bring about a reduction in the volume of outstanding bank notes. It seems clear that European nations—some more than others—must do all these things. But more, they must put such restrictions on imports as to bar out goods that are not vitally necessary for their rehabilitation. It is imperative that the European countries work, tax, save, restrict imports to necessities, and above all, reverse the mad policy of printing bank notes. On these points economists are in agreement.

If continental Europe does not show a disposition to put her house in order, it is not too much to suggest that British and American financiers, as well as the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, should exert at least moral pressure to bring about this result. The United States could even lay down as a condition precedent to its financial cooperation or aid serious and intelligent efforts at financial and monetary rehabilitation by the countries of Europe.

Further in his remarks he has this to say:

The United States owes to Europe, as well as itself, the duty of keeping its house in order. If the United States does not do the best it can with its own resources it will do less than is possible for Europe. In considering foreign trade and the export of American capital not only the needs or demands of Europe must be taken into account but also the capacity of Americans to export capital without seriously affecting domestic industry. Europe would not gain in the long run from the impairment of American resources and capital. Too much emphasis can be placed on what America can do for Europe and not enough on what Europe can and must do for herself. European countries owe America the duty of righting their economic position by strong adherence to sound and sane rules of financing, taxation, and fiscal operations. It is important that attention be given the needs of Europe for capital, but it is necessary also to consider American needs.

Mr. H. F. Poor, vice president of the Garfield National Bank, of New York, says:

These debts must be paid or canceled. If they are canceled, what will be the result?

The Treasury Department report shows that whatever interest was paid came from the proceeds of the new loans, and that when the credits were exhausted interest payments stopped, showing clearly that the proceeds of foreign taxation have not been used to pay interest or principal.

In other words, the foreigner has not been taxed to pay anything to America, so that the interest on $10,000,000,000 of Liberty bonds, which Congress intended to be covered by the interest on these foreign loans, must now be raised by taxation in this country. The citizen of America is actually paying in taxation to-day the interest on these foreign loans.

Cancellation would therefore keep this burden on the backs of the American taxpayers, and in addition would add the burden of amortizing the ten billions of Liberty bonds.

On the contrary, if the foreigner paid us the interest and amortized the principal of these debts, these payments would cover the interest and amortization of a like amount of Liberty bonds and reduce our taxation by so much.

Cancellation would mean increasing our taxation about two hundred and seventy-five millions a year.

Payment by the foreigner should mean reducing our taxation by about eight hundred millions a year, or a net gain or loss of over a billion dollars, about 22 per cent of our present taxation.

The Financial Age, under date of January 29, 1921, page 170, says:

It is regarded as little short of ridiculous for this country to continue staggering along under its immense tax imposition, which might be greatly relieved by the collection of part of the allied principal due, certainly the back interest.

* * * The interest at least should be paid. It is only justice to the overtaxed citizens of this country that this should be done.

I quote from another gentleman who has studied this question:

The United States went into the war with a debt of less than $1,000,000,000 and came out of the war owing a debt of over $24,000,000,000. About $10,000,000,000 of this debt represents money loaned to allied Governments. Not one dollar of principal or interest on these loans has been paid.

I presume the writer means in cash, for some interest has been paid in goods or property.

The United States, however, has not defaulted in interest payments upon its Liberty bonds, and it is therefore in the position of assuming the burden of its debtors. It has been able to do this by imposing heavy taxes upon the people.

If the United States had expended all of the money raised by bonds, the people would ungrudgingly pay their taxes and recoup a portion of them by collecting interest on their Liberty bonds. But two-fifths of the debt ought to be lifted off the people and placed where it belongs, upon the shoulders of the borrowers. There is no fair play in requiring Americans to pay taxes upon $10,000,000,000 to make up for the default of interest payments by foreign borrowers.

This is equivalent to compelling American taxpayers to contribute to the support of Great Britain, France, Italy, and the other allied countries. Americans are quite willing to be patient in collecting the loan, but they can not be expected to waive all interest and assume the burden themselves.

When foreign Governments owing money to the United States are in the attitude of defaulting in their interest payments while at the same time spending large sums for armies, navies, air fleets, forts, oil fields, commercial enterprises, and so forth, it is inevitable that Americans should question the wisdom of postponing indefinitely the adjustment of the loans. Time works to the disadvantage of the lender when there is a lack of clear agreements.

We are now, Mr. President, under this process, in fact, loaning foreign Governments about $1,000,000 a day; in that we are forgiving the interest or deferring it we are, in fact, imposing upon the American taxpayers the burden of taking care of our taxes and continuing to loan to foreign Governments at the rate of nearly $1,000,000 a day. To the extent which the foreign Governments can in good faith meet this debt and the interest upon it, we should inform them that we expect that to be done. The policy should be a definite, a positive, and a firm policy; otherwise it never will achieve anything.

There is one other feature of this question, Mr. President, to which I desire to call attention, and that is the relation of the foreign debt to disarmament. If I had my way about it I would not fund the foreign debt nor defer the interest, even assuming that at some time that might be done, until after the disarmament parley had concluded its final session. It may be a matter of very great importance in the treatment of the questions which will arise at that parley. Certainly, if the foreign Governments are unable, as they say, to meet their foreign debt and yet continue to expend the vast sums which they are now expending for armament, it would cause us to adopt an entirely different policy in case there should be a failure to agree upon disarmament. For one, if there should be a reluctance upon their part to enter upon any reasonable agreement with reference to disarmament, I should certainly consider that the American people would feel justified in insisting that they promptly arrange their debt and promptly meet the interest upon their debt.

France at the present time has about 800,000 men in her army. She is the most thoroughly militaristic nation in Europe if not in the world. Her expenditures for her military equipment are the greatest of any power in the world. I recognize, of course, in the relationship between Germany and France a situation which would justify a reasonable preparedness on her part; but an army of 800,000 men under the conditions in which Germany finds herself at the present time is very difficult to justify.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator tell us what that army is costing France?

Mr. BORAH. No; I have been unable to get that information.

Mr. REED. I think it is safe to say $1,000,000 a day, is it not, in any event?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I have endeavored to get it in more ways than one, but I have not been able to get it, and therefore can not state it; but Senators can imagine what 800,000 men are costing.

The British Navy will cost this year about $765,586,080 and the British Army very much more. I have seen it stated as high as $1,968,300,000—that is, her army in Ireland, in India, in China, in Mesopotamia, and so forth. I read a statement made by a Member of Parliament that England is expending in her attempt to control Mesopotamia $40,000,000 per month.

Now, what is the effect of this under the present program, Mr. President? The effect of it is that the taxpayer of the United States is not only bearing the burdens with reference to our own armaments, but the American taxpayer is, in fact, carrying the burden of the armaments of France and England and Italy. Let it not be forgotten or misunderstood that under this policy we are not only financing our armaments program, but we are financing the armaments program of Europe, or a large part of Europe.

If I have a farm and finance it, stock it, and furnish the means to run it, and also furnish to my neighbor the means to stock his farm and run it, and collect neither principal nor interest, I am carrying both farms, am I not? So long as this debt remains unpaid and the interest remains unpaid, and the American taxpayer must meet the taxes which are imposed upon him because of the deferment of interest and the payment of the principal, we are taking care of the entire armaments of the United States and our late allies. I say, therefore, that it would be short-sighted policy, indeed, for the United States to place itself in a position where it might not modify its policy with reference to the payment of the debt or the interest according to the result of the disarmament conference. To my mind that is the most important feature at the present time connected with this question of the payment of the foreign debt.

Understand me, of course, Mr. President, in speaking of this matter, and urging as I do the taking care of this debt, I recognize that those countries have their obligations and their difficulties and adversities now the same as we have; but I insist that there should be the best evidence of the best of faith upon the part of these Governments in meeting their debt, and that the United States should insist upon that policy without equivocation or apology.

I am therefore, Mr. President, not in favor of any decisive movement with reference to this debt at the present time. It is there. The evidence of it is there. It is a legal obligation. It is just as binding as if it were in a bond. It is subject to call. We may ask for it now, the same as we could if we had a bond and it was due. There is no possible loss. We may utilize it. We may utilize the interest. There is only one thing involved, and that is the question of policy. There is no necessity for funding it for the purpose of putting it in better legal condition. So far no statement has been made as to any financial advantage. So far nothing has been said that would disclose an advantage to the American taxpayer, while upon the other hand if the debt is left subject to call, it is ours to utilize as emergencies arise and conditions suggest. It will play an important part at the Washington conference, whether it is ever mentioned or not. It will be there, coloring and shaping and directing all the proceedings, molding and shaping the councils in their final conclusion; and it will be vastly to the advantage of the United States if it remains just as it is now until we shall have determined whether the world can get rid of its armaments or whether we are to go forward over the road which we are now traveling and which leads inevitably to bankruptcy or war, and possibly both.

So vital and so commanding is the question of disarmament I would utilize all the power that this great Republic can command to change the program relative to armaments which is now being carried forward; and if I could use this vast debt, if the obligations which it imposes could be commanded to that end, I would not hesitate to do it. I would be considerate, I would be courteous, to all nations, but I would be brutal in the exertion of all power at my command before I would see humanity further tortured and civilization destroyed by keeping up this barbarous system of crushing armaments.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the very able speech of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]; and in all that he has said about our efforts to collect this debt and collect the interest, I concur. I think he is right; but in respect to all these loans that have been made to Europe by private parties and by the United States Government I think he looks at the question from what seems to me a stray angle. You would naturally conclude, from listening to the remarks of the Senator, that our country had been depleted by these loans to the extent of $25,000,000,000. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, if the question is examined it will be found that the bulk of both these private loans and these Government loans was devoted to paying for American products and supplies, and the bulk of the money, the large share of the money that was advanced by private parties here and by the Government, never left the United States, but remained in this country to pay for American products and supplies.

Long before we got into the war the countries of Europe came here to get their food supplies and their munitions, and in order to get them they borrowed money from our bankers here. Neutral countries borrowed money, the countries at war borrowed money, and most of the money was left here in this country to pay for munitions, food supplies, and other articles that were shipped abroad.

Take these loans that were made since the armistice. A large share of them—I do not know exactly what proportion—were devoted to the purchase of American food supplies for the European countries, and but for those loans and advances that we made my opinion is that we would have had as poor a market for our products in Europe during the war as we have had this year. It was because of those advances and credits that our products found a market in Europe and that we got fair prices for them. So if you look into the question from that angle you will find, first, that the money constituting these enormous capital advances, as they are called, by our Government and private parties did not leave the country. Most of it remained here. What left the country were American products, agricultural products and manufactured products of various kinds. That was the bulk of it; I do not say all of it.

Mr. President, I want to draw a lesson in connection with the pending bill from our experience with these foreign loans. These foreign loans and commitments were in their essence, though not altogether, the same as is proposed in the bill now pending before the Senate. They were advances made to those countries to enable them to buy our food products and other supplies. We got all kinds of bonds and securities. There were the de jure Governments—France, Italy, England, and other countries—that could give us valid bonds. There were some instances—I can not at this moment recall them—in which de facto governments borrowed money from us, or got commitments, and gave such security as their pro tempore governments, such as they were, could give. Some of those securities are of very doubtful and questionable character. We have valid bonds and securities, I take it, as against England, France, and Italy; but in the case of some of the new countries that were created out of parts of old ones, it may be a question whether the new governments will be ready to approve the securities, and therefore they ought to be settled as soon as possible.

Coming now to the lesson, we are having a great deal of trouble in collecting this money. We shall have a great deal of trouble in collecting the interest, as the Senator from Idaho has well said. Now, take the bill that is under consideration here, creating this corporation. If we go on and buy the agricultural products of this country and sell them to Europe, we shall be, in the end, almost in the same fix about getting paid for the supplies that are to be bought by this corporation that we are in with respect to our foreign bonds to-day. Therefore, while one part of the program, the purchasing part, seems to me smooth sailing and easy enough, when you come to sell those products abroad you are confronted with the question of whether you can sell them for cash or on credit; and, if on credit, what kind of credit?

There is another question that I want to suggest at this moment. I have thought much about it, but I am getting too old to talk much about these things now. It is this:

We are anxious to build up trade and commerce with Europe. We are all anxious to have a market for our products, and to get paid for those products either in cash or in valid securities. But, Mr. President, here is one question that stares me in the face: With those devastated countries of Europe rendered almost helpless by the Great War, financially embarrassed, and seeking gradually to rehabilitate themselves, how can we hope that those people will have any money to buy our goods unless we give them a little chance to sell their own products in this country? To my mind, there never was a more critical time for preparing a tariff bill in this country than there is now.

Since the days of the Civil War economic and financial conditions in Europe never have been as they are to-day; and if you proceed with a tariff bill along the old lines, as the situation was when everything was booming and in good order in Europe, I fear it will be like a kicking gun.

I am only making these suggestions, Mr. President. I am not an expert on the tariff, and never have been; but the thought has occurred to me time and again, how can those poor people in Europe buy our products, which we are so anxious to sell? How can they trade with us unless we give them something of an opportunity to trade with us and sell some of their products?

Coming to this matter of credits, what is the situation? In this connection I want to say to my friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], who I know is very zealous in support of the farm export bill, and who deserves credit for it, that he represents the interests of the farmer from one angle. When this corporation is created and proceeds to buy the goods of the farmers—their cattle, their sheep, their wool, their wheat, and their cotton—the next duty of the corporation will be to sell those products to foreign Governments, or sell them to private individuals. Its duty is not only to sell them but to get something in return for them, either cash or some security that is valuable; and that will present the same question, as I said a moment ago, which confronts us in respect to the foreign loans.

Therefore, in view of these facts, I think the Committee on Finance, in framing the tariff bill, ought to take into consideration the questions I have in this brief manner suggested. I think it is very important that they should bear in mind, when they frame the tariff bill, that they must leave an opening, a door, for the farmers of this country to get in and obtain some protection.

Suppose you give the manufacturers of this country ample protection; suppose you fence them in, if you please, and prevent any interference with their trade. How will that aid the farmer? He has to pay the price of the manufactured goods, but his agricultural products are in the air, subject to the law of supply and demand; and we have had an illustration this year of how inexorable is the law of supply and demand. That is one of the questions that our farmers will have to confront.

Of all the classes of our people who were hit by the falling prices arising from the operation of the law of supply and demand, our cotton farmers, our grain farmers, and our cattle farmers were the worst hit of all. They were hit because they were more helpless; there was no law to protect them; they were subject to the inexorable law of supply and demand. But that is not the case with the others.

Readjustment has gone on slowly in this country, Mr. President. The farmers have been compelled by this law of trade to readjust the prices of their products. But how is it as to the other interests in the country?

Mr. President, I am no enemy of labor. I have been a hard-working man all my days, and my sympathies run in that direction; and they are pretty strong, too. But what is the situation? The laboring men of the country have been insisting upon war-time wages. We all know that there was a great scarcity of buildings during the war. All the mechanics and tradesmen were devoting themselves to Government work, and there was a great scarcity of buildings in the country. My opinion is that if the laboring men had come down to reasonable figures and not insisted on war pay, and if the material men had done the same, we would have seen the greatest building boom in the country ever known; we would not have seen a bricklayer or a painter or a plasterer idle in the country.

We have had the same experience in reference to our railroads. The railroad companies have been trying to get a reduction in the cost of operation. They have had hard sledding, but they have not been in as bad a fix as some of the other industries found themselves in. They have been subject to Federal control, and have in a measure recouped themselves by laying off a good many of their men. Thousands of men who were employed on railroads are to-day idle, because the railroad companies, in spite of the great increase in passenger and freight rates, are unable to make both ends meet.

We can never hope for prosperity in this country until there is a readjustment in these directions. The farmers have had to reduce their prices; the laboring men must, in all reason, expect to have their wages reduced from the high war figures to reasonable figures, and the wages paid railroad employees must be lowered, for without these reductions prosperity will not come to this country.

The wholesale dealers have come down a little in their prices. The great bane we are encountering to-day is the retail dealer.

The retail dealers refuse to come down; and although to-day a grass-fed steer is worth only 5 or 6 cents a pound, we still have to pay in the market 40 cents a pound for a roast or beefsteak. Such conditions are bad, Mr. President.

Now, one more word in respect to the pending bill. I am as anxious to help the farmers as anyone can be, but I do not think the plan proposed furnishes the proper remedy. I fear, as I said a moment ago, that when they come to sell these goods, and come to collect the price of them, either in money or credits, they will strike a snag that will be insurmountable, and will leave us in the future with a financial load as big as the one we have to-day in this foreign debt.

I do not want Senators to understand from anything I have said that I am in any way hostile to the payment of the foreign debt which is owed to our Government. I am as anxious as anyone to see that debt met as promptly as can be.

But we must look at it from this angle. Europe will not be able to meet this debt as promptly as she could if there were some industrial revival over there. Europe needs our raw materials for the development of her factories and industries. Unless there is an industrial revival in Europe, Senators must see on reflection that there will be a poor prospect of collecting anything from those countries. I hope that whatever legislation we enact will be of such a character that it will give those devastated and demoralized and financially crippled countries a reasonable opportunity to revive their languishing industries and put them on their feet, so that they will be enabled to meet their obligations and enabled to buy the products of the American farmers.

I hope Senators will excuse me for making this rambling talk. I have simply aimed to state, in a brief and perfunctory manner, how the situation at home and abroad strikes me.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was very greatly interested in the speech made a few moments ago on the question of the collection of our foreign debts by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who always makes a good speech, and this time made an unusually strong one. I indorse absolutely all he said about the advisability of the collection of the interest on our foreign debts generally. He has adduced facts and figures which are to my mind unanswerable. There is no reason whatsoever why the Secretary of the Treasury should not close the matter in accordance with existing law.

As to the question of postponing the collection or any steps toward the collection of the debts, or the interest thereon, until after the proposed disarmament conference, that is a matter which needs careful consideration, and, so far as I am advised, I can not say what course should be adopted, although the plan does seem to be well worthy of the most careful consideration, as the suggestions of the Senator from Idaho are always deserving of consideration.

But the question I want to put to the Senator from Idaho is, What have we in the Senate or House to do with it anyway? I do not know whether the Senator happened to read an editorial in yesterday's Washington Herald, owned and edited, I believe, by a member of the Cabinet, Mr. Hoover, who takes a very different view from that taken by the Senator from Idaho and from that I take in the matter, and I think a different view from that of many other Senators. I merely call attention to what he said in this editorial. I shall not read it all. Mr. Hoover believes, judging from this editorial, that the Congress is unfitted for the task of directing how the debts should be funded or of determining whether the interest should be collected or deferred. The only trouble with the Secretary's position is that the Constitution and laws of the United States, which he as well as we swore to uphold, puts the responsibility upon us to fix the law by which these debts are to be funded and the interest collected, and if we turn it over to the Secretary of the Treasury, without saying how it should be done, we are violating our duty. The Secretary has no duty in regard to the matter except what the Congress imposes, and confessedly he has not performed the duty that the Congress has already imposed upon him about these debts, namely, to take bonds for the debts, when he has only taken I O U's.

The editorial reads in part:

Secretary Mellon, as this Government's fiscal agent, has asked unlimited power to handle all of these obligations. The Senate committee, constituting itself a board of directors, appears to doubt either his ability or his trustworthiness. Even the impossible condition has been suggested, that any agreement he might make must be ratified by the Senate, where it might be debated to death or held until it died of starvation.

Is it not remarkable that the Senate should butt into this affair in accordance with the Constitution, when other "interests," as will appear later, want to handle it? I am sorry to see Mr. Mellon insisting on a power that no king or emperor on earth would ask for and none could obtain. I am just as sorry to see Mr. Hoover uphold such a claim for feudal power, which could only be granted on the principle that the king can do no wrong.

The suggestion that the Senate has anything to do with this matter of $11,000,000,000 is, according to this, impossible. The editorial continues:

Ultimately some one must be trusted to make these settlements.

Here is what I call to the attention of Senators particularly:

When made, the agreement must satisfy the financial interests of this country, rather than the Senate or individual Senators.

I stop in the reading of this editorial, which must be inspired by the administration, because coming from one of the organs of the administration, and therefore I say to my friend from Idaho that it seems Members of the Senate have nothing to do with it; it has to be passed upon by the "financial interests," not the Senate of the United States and by the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if that was a quotation from some testimony?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am reading from an editorial in yesterday's Washington Herald, commonly supposed to be owned by Mr. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. I misunderstood the Senator. I heard him say he was reading from an editorial, but I supposed it was quoting Mr. Mellon's testimony.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am reading from the editorial.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. The editorial continues:

When made the agreements must satisfy the financial interests of this country rather than the Senate or individual Senators. It will be the financial agencies, not the legislative, who must indorse these bonds as acceptable investments. It would seem to be beyond peradventure that if satisfactory to these men—

Referring to the financial interests, of course—

they would represent the best possible bargain in this country. If there is anyone better fitted to carry through these negotiations than is Mr. Mellon, or any commission, he says he would be glad to be relieved of the responsibility. Whether man or commission, the same experience Mr. Mellon has must be found and trusted. Whether one or more, they must consult with the same men with whom he will certainly consult. Maybe the best way out would be to name a nonpartisan commission of Senators.

Listen to this. The editorial ends in this way:

But certainly neither Senate nor House can lay down rules to be followed as to the greatest financial refunding problem the world has ever known, in which unknown elements will constantly develop.

I am afraid that we who have thought that the Senate and House have some rights about the matter have been mistaken. This editorial reads us out of the sphere of the Constitution. We are but crafty interlopers. We should be shown our proper place.

If that last is a statement coming directly from the administration I fear that what Members of the Senate may think about the question of refunding the loans at this time, or at the time of the disarmament conference, or what we may think about collecting the interest at all, will be of no avail. The Secretary of the Treasury refuses to tell the committee how he is going to do it, and, according to the newspapers says he has no real plans himself. All I can say about this is we had better let the matter rest until he forms some plans about it, and then discuss them with him after he has informed himself and the committee.

Senators will remember that when we loaned this money we laid down certain rules and regulations by which the lending must be governed, and the rules in those acts have never been complied with by any department of the Government. For about a year now I have been complaining because this has not been done, and we have not even yet got the inside facts, though I have tried my best. I might have felt bad over my failure, but I have noticed members of the Finance Committee have been trying their very best to elicit information, but no real information has yet come. There is not a Senator on the floor who can say to what extent our Government has acted, directly or indirectly, in reference to these loans. There is not a Senator on the floor who can say whether there is an implied agreement that we must forego the interest for 1 year or for 2 years or 10 years or 15 years, and not a reason has been offered, not a suggestion has been made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Whenever we ask these gentlemen a question before any of the committees we are told, "We do not know exactly ourselves, but we want absolute and complete authority; we want you to turn over the powers of Congress in regard to it. You are incapable of dealing with it," as this newspaper editorial said. What is the Senate for, anyway? What is the House for, anyway? They are here to legislate for the American people and to talk about things that are not material, but when it comes to dealing with a debt like $11,000,000,000 the administration must take it over. Congress is incapable of dealing with the matter. We must turn it over to an officer who has already failed to carry out the law and who says he has no views about how the new powers should be executed if given to him. All he wants is power to keep a meddling Senate or an inquisitive House from attempting to interfere.

By the way, when I say this I am not partisan about it, because the last administration seems to have taken exactly the same view of it that this administration takes, with one exception. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has well said, President Wilson had the patriotism to stand up and say that the debts would never be forgiven and that the American people would insist upon payment and with interest. They are going to insist upon it, too.

Senators, I merely rose to make this statement and to read the editorial to show what is going on, because it is going to come right straight up to us to say whether we are going to have anything to do with the collection of the debt or whether we are going to turn it over to some one, when nobody knows what will be done, according to the undisputed testimony. The Secretary will not tell us what is going to be done; he has not told us yet, and if any Senator here thinks he has told us I would be delighted if he would rise in his place and tell us just what that plan is. If we permit this "cat in the bag" bill to pass, then there is no use for a Congress. We might as well let the administration, or any of its agents, issue ukases, and abide by them. It would be much more economical, and the result will be the same. I venture the assertion that our constituents will keep up with these debts, and if the Congress makes a slip about them all who do so will be held responsible. The Senator from Idaho is right.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate only for a moment. I simply wish to make one remark, not exactly by way of reply, but in reference to the address of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who always speaks with very great clarity and directness. I do not think he meant to leave the inference which might possibly be drawn from one part of his statement, but the statement is made in substance by many people that if we did loan this money to foreign governments that does not make very much difference because we sold them our goods for the money, and some people are inclined to treat that as though when we gave them the goods and got our own money back the transaction was balanced and we were out nothing.

I beg to suggest that even though foreign governments did spend this money in the United States for American goods they got the goods and they have the goods, and it took time and labor and money to produce the goods. All that we gained by having the goods purchased in this country was the profit upon the goods. That profit did not flow to the American people alike. That profit, as a matter of fact, reached directly only a very few people. Upon the other hand, it is a serious question in my mind whether the disruption of the ordinary course of commerce and the excessive prices paid for some of those goods were not in the long run a disadvantage to our country.

No better illustration can be found than in the fact cited by the Senator from Minnesota himself. He stated that we quit building houses, that wages had gone up to such a point due to the war, and part of that rise antedated our entrance into the war, that houses are not now being built.

Now let us see just what that means. Houses are not being built because of the advance in material and wages incident to the European war, and which would not have occurred in this country probably except for the loans. We therefore quit building houses. Rents accordingly mounted, and every citizen of the United States who had to pay rent has been paying a tribute ever since and is worse off to the amount of his rent than if he had never been concerned in loaning the money to Europe.

I speak of this because I have been frequently confronted before the Finance and other committees with the argument that all of this money was spent in the United States and that therefore we ought not to expect to be very insistent upon collecting either principal or interest. If the money was spent in the United States, speaking by and large a few great contractors and producers got the major portion of it. But even they were obliged to employ labor and capital that otherwise could have been employed and the goods remained in this country to the benefit of the country.

It is a fallacy to assume that because a foreign nation borrows money and then buys goods from us we are thereby made whole. We will be approximately made whole when they proceed to pay for the goods. They got $10,000,000,000 worth of goods at the market price for the $10,000,000,000 of money that we loaned to them.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator, then, following that line of argument, see any great difference in principle between the advancing of $10,000,000,000 or thereabouts during the war and the advancing of money under the proposed unfinished business, the farmers' aid bill, providing for a Federal corporation to buy here and sell abroad?

Mr. REED. Yes; there is a great difference in principle, but the proposition now to advance money to sell goods abroad has not half the excuse back of it that could be advanced for the loaning of money during the war, not half.

Mr. President, while I am referring to that and in connection with the very illuminating remarks made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who, contrary to the old aphorism, whenever he opens his mouth says something worth while, I submit that not only are the military establishments being maintained but the military establishments of these countries, not all of them but many of them, have been regularly employed in the destructive work of war. Poland had a great war and we sold to Poland on credit a vast amount of army supplies. We furnished a vast amount of money in addition to that which I once asserted was used to help Poland perpetuate that war. The reply came back that not a penny of it had been furnished to the Polish Army. All they had done with it was to feed the civilian population back of the army, thus enabling the army to keep in the field, the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum.

In addition to that, the papers of only the day before yesterday informed us that France proposed to settle the Silesian question by her army. The papers of this morning, I think, stated that that crisis had been passed over. But the holding of an army ready to march and in a menacing attitude costs money, and it costs not only money to France but to the countries interested upon the other side of the question.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment to say that the nations which are our creditors now have under arms an aggregate of 3,000,000 men, or more than there were in that territory before the outbreak of the great European war?

Mr. REED. Following that statement, those 3,000,000 men can not be kept in the field and paid and provisioned and furnished with equipment and armament for less than $2 per head per day, and that means $6,000,000 a day. If that amount of money were set aside and turned over to the United States, our war debt would very speedily begin to disappear.

However, in connection with what I was saying, since the Washington Herald, the official organ of one member of the Cabinet, has been cited here, I cite another editorial appearing in the issue of to-day. After commenting upon the success which Greece has had recently in Turkey, the editorial continues:

Certainly Greece is entitled to support from France as well as Great Britain. She went to Asia Minor at the request of the Paris council's "big three," which included President Wilson. She was asked to occupy Smyrna to head off its seizure by Italy. More than this, Smyrna is Greek, as is the near hinterland. Italy does not forget, but France does, while the United States recognizes no moral obligation that was imposed by Mr. Wilson.

For the first time, the Turks are where they can be held, if Greece receives but decent recognition for her service.

One avowed purpose of the war, as evidenced by the treaty of Sevres, has been fulfilled.

I do not know whether this editorial was written by a Cabinet member or whether it was simply paid for by him, but it contains some statements of fact that have not hitherto been very public. If it is true that Greece was put in to the war at present being waged by the joint action of the Allies, then they are, of course, responsible for its continuance. If France and England are sending Greek armies into Asia Minor in order to keep Italy, another one of our allies, from grabbing that country, then that is a very important fact that we ought to know, because it forces the conclusion that what these countries are doing to-day is quarreling over spoils, and that England and France are inducing Greece to carry on a war in order to keep Italy from feeding herself full at the expense of the Turk; and we, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has shown in his powerful argument, are really financing that operation.

But, sir, we have done it very directly. There was some kind of agreement, the inside of which has never yet been quite exposed, between England and France and the United States to furnish to Greece a stipulated sum of money. I have forgotten the exact figures, though I think the amount was $50,000,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. It was thirty some million dollars on our part.

Mr. REED. The amount which they claimed the United States was to contribute was some thirty-odd million dollars. France and England refused to contribute their share, according to the best evidence I have been able to get, but within the last 90 days we have paid $16,000,000. What for? Plainly we are engaged at least in helping Greece wipe out some of her debts, and thus directly contributing to the ability of Greece to carry on this conflict. It is a conflict which I do not think concerns us. Certainly I have no interest, and I believe the country has no interest, if Smyrna is to be taken away from Turkey, whether the Italian Government or the Grecian Government gets it.

I do not intend to hold the floor; but there are many things to be said about other loans which have been made in recent times. There is just one further remark I desire to make for the benefit of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], and that is, so far as the evidence before the Finance Committee goes, it tends strongly to show that while there never was a hard and fast agreement made and signed by which we promised to forego the payment of the interest upon the foreign debt due us for a period of three years, negotiations were carried on which began with that suggestion and with the further suggestion that we should forgive the interest upon the accumulated interest, amounting to approximately $40,000,000 a year. In the subsequent negotiations, so far as they have been exposed and laid before us, the documents treat the extension of the interest as an accomplished thing, as something agreed upon, although each of these documents contains a clause that it is not binding until ratified.

The Secretary of the Treasury seemed, so far as I could make out his testimony—and it was very Delphic in its nature—to feel that there was probably an obligation to postpone the interest and to waive the payment of compound interest, because if there had been no absolute agreement there had been some sort of understanding that had been acted upon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. GERRY. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] first rose, and I will first yield to him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri was present in the Chamber when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], who was formerly Secretary of the Treasury, rose the other day and stated that while he was Secretary of the Treasury one of his assistants was sent to Europe and had about completed an agreement by which our foreign loans were to be funded into interest-bearing bonds. I wonder if the Committee on Finance have had that witness before them? I believe that that witness could give very valuable information.

Mr. REED. I think that witness has been sent for. We found his name in various papers, and I know certain members of the committee asked that he be called. I think he will be called, if he has not already been called. He has not, however, as yet testified.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri now yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator from Missouri, but my understanding of the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury was to the effect that he had under consideration the question whether there was any moral obligation on the part of our Government not to demand interest until April, 1922; but I do not think he extended it beyond that period.

Mr. REED. That embraces the three years.

Mr. GERRY. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. REED. That completes the three years.

Mr. GERRY. But the Secretary has not as yet sent in his report to the committee?

Mr. REED. No; he has not finally answered that question.

Mr. GERRY. Exactly.

Mr. REED. But the whole trend of his testimony indicated that he thought there was an obligation of that kind.

Mr. GERRY. I think that is true.

Mr. REED. That is what I tried to say before, as nearly as I could.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say a few words regarding the editorial which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] read from the Washington Herald, which contains the statement that it will be the financial agencies and not the legislative that must indorse the bonds as acceptable instruments, and that—

Certainly neither the Senate nor House can lay down rules to be followed as to the greatest financial refunding problem the world has ever known, in which unknown elements will constantly develop.

That is a very natural view for an Englishman to take, a man who has spent all of his grown life in England, dealing with British financiers, who is accustomed to the British form of government, under which the Government undertakes the direction of financial matters, makes up its budget, indicates where the money shall be spent and how it shall be spent, and then calls upon Parliament to make the appropriations. I am not at all surprised that Mr. Hoover takes this view. I do not think he means any discourtesy at all to the Congress of the United States; he simply does not understand the situation. Not having been here long enough as yet to vote and never having voted in the United States, and having his investments still in the syndicates of Great Britain, being in close touch with their financial interests and knowing how powerful and potential they are, it is only natural that he should take the view that Congress has no business to say anything about this matter; that it should be left to the financial authorities, and that they should be given carte blanche to do whatsoever seemed to them proper.

I say this, Mr. President, in order that the somewhat harsh criticism that the Senator from Tennessee made may be a little bit mollified. We should always take into consideration the circumstances under which any statement is made and the environment of the gentleman making it.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL BUILDING PROGRAM.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask if the Senator from Utah expects to address the Senate at this time.

Mr. KING. Yes; for a few moments only.

Mr. McCORMICK. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I will yield to the Senator from Illinois if he desires to speak.

Mr. McCORMICK. I had expected to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution, but I will wait until the Senator from Utah concludes.

Mr. KING. I shall take but a few minutes.

Mr. President, I offer for reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill to terminate construction on six battleships and three battle cruisers authorized by the act approved August 29, 1916, which provided what has been known as the 1916 naval program. The bill also provides for the conversion of two battle cruisers, authorized by the act in question, into airplane carriers, and also requires the Navy Department to let contracts for four fleet submarines which were likewise authorized by the act of 1916.

As Senators know, I have opposed the policy of the Navy Department in its blind adherence to the 1916 program. I have insisted that it was a mistake to construct 11 battleships costing nearly $50,000,000 each, which were provided for in an act passed in 1916. I have contended, both in the Committee on Naval Affairs and upon the floor of the Senate, that if the act of 1916 were carried into effect it would cost the Government approximately $1,500,000,000 for the construction of the vessels called for by the act, and the auxiliary vessels, and so forth, that would be required. I have also demonstrated that when these battleships are complete they would be out of date and that their construction would mean a waste of hundreds of millions of dollars. I called attention to the fact that our navalistic policy had quite recently driven Great Britain into the adoption of a naval program calling for four super-Hood capital ships, each one of which would have 55,000 tons displacement and carry 20-inch guns. These four super-Hoods will be so powerful that the capital ships authorized by the 1916 program will be comparatively valueless. My position was that we should complete those battleships that were more than 70 per cent finished, but that work upon the five battleships upon which but little had been spent should be suspended. I also contended that we should suspend work upon at least four of the six battle cruisers provided for in the 1916 program. My views were not adopted, and the Navy Department is continuing work upon the 10 battleships and 6 battle cruisers, although the amount of work done upon 5 of the battleships and the battle cruisers is comparatively unimportant.

There is no reason why we should not immediately suspend work upon the five battleships, and the battle cruisers with the exception of perhaps one. By so doing, we would save hundreds of millions of dollars to the taxpayers of our country. I have pressed this same question heretofore and have been defeated both in the committee and upon the floor of the Senate, but I believe the recent experiments conducted by the Navy and Army demonstrate the propriety of the policy which is suggested in the bill which I now offer.

I will not now take the time of the Senate to explain the tests which were recently made or analyze the results thereof, but will content myself with a brief reference thereto.

Senators are familiar with the fact that during the past few weeks experiments have been conducted at sea with a view to determining the importance of naval aircraft in naval warfare. Tests were also made by dropping bombs upon submarines, the German cruiser Frankfort, one or more destroyers, and the German battleship Ostfriesland. These tests emphasized the importance of a three-plane Navy and conclusively demonstrated that we must give more attention to naval aircraft. The tests show how impotent a battle fleet would be, unless protected by aircraft and submarines. In my opinion, the tests show that battleships are less important in naval warfare than many of the naval officials are willing to concede. The Ostfriesland was a battleship of approximately 25,000 tons and was probably one of the very best of the German ships. Its construction was of the highest order and the completed vessel measured up to a high standard of perfection. It was quickly sunk by a bomb dropped from an airplane; the bomb not striking the ship but exploding in the water in close proximity to the ship's hull.

I repeat, these tests make it imperative that our naval program be changed, and show the lack of wisdom in doggedly adhering to the 1916 program. We should at once cease work upon five of the battleships and convert two of the battle cruisers into airplane carriers.

I supported the proposition to build two airplane carriers, because I believed that aircraft were indispensable in naval warfare. I believe that if we would modify the 1916 program, cut out some of the battleships and some of the battle cruisers, modify the types, apply the lessons of the war to those completed, and then build better aircraft and two airplane carriers and a few first-class fleet submarines we would be not only lightening the burdens of the people but contributing to the building of a modern and efficient Navy. I feel confident that the position which I have taken is the sound one and that time will vindicate the same.

I sincerely hope that the committee will immediately take up this bill and report it back to the Senate in order that we may act upon it.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. Does the Senator's bill propose that two of the battle cruisers that we are now building shall be converted into airplane carriers?

Mr. KING. Yes; two of the battle cruisers.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator realizes that when the 1916 program is completed we will have only six battle cruisers?

Mr. KING. I appreciate that.

Mr. GERRY. And that battle cruisers are what the American Navy has been very much in need of for a long time past, and that if the policy of his bill is carried out he is taking two of the most valuable capital ships from the American Navy?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not quite agree with my friend as to the value of the so-called capital ships. I believe that if we will emphasize the submarine and the airplane we will be doing a great service to the Navy and to the American people; and if we will change or modify the 1916 program and, if we are to build battleships, conform them to the lessons of the war, I am sure that we would be doing a great service to the country.

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator that I am entirely in accord with his idea of the necessity of building airplane carriers; that before the naval bill was reported to the Senate I introduced an amendment authorizing the building of airplane carriers; that I heartily supported the provision in the bill which made the appropriation for those vessels, and I was very sorry when the House refused to agree to it in conference and insisted on the provision for those very necessary and valuable units being stricken out of the bill. I understand that it is the intention of the acting chairman of the committee—in fact, he stated it here on the floor of the Senate when the conference report was under discussion—that he would try to have passed a bill for the construction of two airplane carriers. I hope that bill will go through. I think they are essential to the Navy; but I can not agree with my friend from Utah that it would be wise, in order to obtain those airplane carriers, to give up our battle cruisers. I think we ought to have both.

There can be no question of the importance of the battle cruiser. As a matter of fact, the Japanese program in 1927 will have 12 battle cruisers to our six, even if our 1916 program is carried out. None of the great nations of the world who have studied the subject, who have studied the lessons of the war, are abandoning their battle cruisers. As a matter of fact, England is building more, and Japan includes them in her program in equal number.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not intend to enter into a discussion of our naval program, but felt constrained, in view of the recent tests to which I referred, to call the attention of the Senate to what I conceived to be the necessary results of the tests and to the importance of modifying the 1916 program. I somewhat regret that my friend has interjected into the few observations which I made his long but very interesting statement, because it calls for a reply. I do not have the time now to consider it, but do not want the Senator and other Senators who hear me to reach the conclusion that a satisfactory reply can not be made thereto. I will only say at this time, by way of reply, that the tests recently made, in my judgment, call for a material change not only in the 1916 program but in the type of our capital ships. We must either build much larger ones or perhaps smaller ones, and both types must be protected from the bombs and explosives dropped from airplanes by heavy steel roofs. Capital ships must have a turtle deck or covering, and the armor plate must afford greater protection to the hulls than present plans provide.

I am not contending that the battleship is doomed, but I do insist that too much importance has been ascribed to it by those officers of the Navy who have failed to respond to the spirit of progress and development which is abroad in the land. There are old fogies in the Navy as there are in other branches of the Government and in all of the activities of life. What we need in the Navy to-day are men of brains and genius and vision. There should be a shaking up in the Navy Department, and if Secretary Denby will get rid of some of the dead timber and surround himself with men of genius and ability he will bring honor and credit to himself and at the same time he will be doing a great service to his country.

The bill (S. 2303) to terminate construction upon six battleships and three battle cruisers authorized by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, and to provide for the conversion of two battle cruisers authorized by said act into airplane carriers, and to require the Navy Department to let contracts for four fleet submarines authorized by said act, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, while I have the floor I desire to introduce a bill in the nature of a substitute for Senate bill 1915, known as the Norris bill. I ask that the bill which I introduce be printed and lie on the table, to be offered at the appropriate time.

The bill (S. 2302) to extend the term and powers of the War Finance Corporation for the purpose of promoting and protecting the export of agricultural products in the United States, was read twice by its title.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate the serious condition of agriculture in the United States. I know how greatly the agricultural interests have suffered by reason of the extraordinary decline in the values of agricultural products. There is no question but what they have suffered more than most branches of industry. The declines in the value of their products have been greater, perhaps, than those of any other products and commodities in the United States. If the prices of manufactured articles, if agricultural implements, and all other things which the farmers are compelled to buy had fallen in the same proportion as their products, then the hardships to which they have been subjected would not have produced the same distress and brought about the acute situation which now exists in agricultural sections. Unfortunately the manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers have resisted in every possible way the movement in favor of price reductions. The prices of most commodities have been and still are too high, and the demands of labor in many avenues have been extreme, and combinations have been formed with respect to many commodities and products to prevent price reductions and, indeed, to destroy all possible competition.

The Sherman antitrust law has been and still is ignored, and State statutes which aimed at the prevention of profiteering and the formation of trusts and monopolies, intrastate in character, have been disregarded. The result has been that the prices of many commodities have been held at war levels, or, at best, but slightly below war levels, and the agriculturalists have been thereby victims of these unfair if not criminal practices.

This has produced a situation which, if possible, should be remedied. Undoubtedly the prices of many commodities must be scaled down, and the combinations that exist to maintain these high levels of prices must be attacked and the criminal laws applied. Of course, the world condition particularly militates against the agriculturalists in the United States. They produced a surplus of agricultural products and must find foreign markets. The condition of Europe is such that there is a limited market for our products. Undoubtedly Europe would be glad to buy more of our agricultural products than she is now purchasing. However, there can be no normal market for our surplus products in foreign countries until Europe produces more and is able to find foreign markets for her exports. Europe can not buy what she would like to purchase upon credits which we extend. Her purchases can only reach a satisfactory level when she can pay for the commodities which she buys largely with her exports.

If we adopt the foolish and fatuous policy of interdicting imports, we are striking a deadly blow not only at agriculture but at the entire economic and industrial life of the people. Our prosperity is dependent largely upon our exports, and our exports are measured by our imports.

Undoubtedly the Senator from Nebraska by his bill hoped to improve the condition of the farmers and the agricultural interests of our country. I am in entire sympathy with the desire of the Senator from Nebraska. I am anxious for the agriculturalists of our country to have prosperity. They are the real producers. They are the builders of our Nation. We have too many parasites in the world and too few who make real contribution to the material advancement and upbuilding of the social organism. Upon the backs of the farmers and those who produce the things indispensable for life rest the superstructure in which we find refuge.

I shall not pause to examine the Senator's bill or to point out what I conceive to be some of its serious defects. I can only say in passing that I do not approve of the Government becoming the buyer and seller of commodities. I believe that that feature of the bill is dangerous and will prove not only injurious to the agriculturalists but to all classes. I do not think there is any necessity of creating a new corporation, even though a governmental corporation may be necessary to give aid to the agriculturalists of our country.

The War Finance Corporation is functioning. It has very great powers. It has an authorized capital of $500,000,000, an amount greatly in excess of that permitted in the bill offered by the Senator from Nebraska. It likewise has power to issue bonds to the extent of three billions as against one billion, the authorized limit of the Norris bill. I think the authorized limit of the War Finance Corporation is too great and I should favor an amendment reducing the maximum amount of bonds which it may issue. The substitute which I am tendering gives specific authority to the War Finance Corporation to make advances for the purpose of assisting in financing the exportation of agricultural products. The powers given to accomplish this end are very liberal.

My substitute also extends the life of the corporation for a period of five years and permits it 10 years within which to liquidate its transactions. I believe that upon mature consideration the Senate will reach the conclusion that there is no necessity of creating a new corporation, or organizing new or additional machinery. There is a disposition too often to increase Federal agencies and to multiply the executive instrumentalities. We create bureaus and commissions and boards by the hundreds instead of consolidating and coordinating. We diffuse and scatter, thus increasing the expenses of the Government and preventing prompt, efficient, and energetic action. Our experience is that Government boards and agencies are usually failures; waste, extravagance, and inefficiency to the highest (or perhaps I should say to the lowest) degree, characterize their activities.

As stated, there is now a corporation, well officered, which has had considerable experience and is now engaged in aiding the agriculturists of the United States. It has already loaned millions to aid the farmers and cotton growers and horticulturalists to find foreign markets. With the machinery now in motion and the organization complete and ably officered, it would be unwise, in my opinion, to create a new organization.

In what I have said I do not mean to be understood as arguing that any corporation is required. There is some question as to whether any plan to put the Government further into private business is wise. Certainly there are grave objections to some of the provisions of the Senator's bill. However, if it is deemed necessary for the Government to take hold of this situation, then I believe the substitute which I have offered will be far more effective than the so-called Norris bill and will, in the long run, be of far greater advantage and benefit to the agricultural interests of the United States.

REPUBLIC OF HAITI AND THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate resolution 112.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Illinois what is the subject matter of his resolution?

Mr. McCORMICK. It is a resolution for the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the occupation and administration of the territories of the Republic of Haiti and the Dominican Republic by the forces of the United States. I conceive that no Senator can object to an impartial investigation.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the resolution unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. McCORMICK. It was unanimously reported from the committee, with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). There being no objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, without making any objection, let us have the resolution read.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Secretary is about to read it now.

Mr. HARRISON. The Presiding Officer said, "There being no objection."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The reading clerk read Senate resolution 112, submitted by Mr. McCORMICK on the 19th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators, appointed by the President of the Senate, is hereby authorized and instructed to inquire into the occupation and administration of the territories of the Republic of Haiti and of the Dominican Republic by the forces of the United States. For this purpose such committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and such places as by it may be deemed advisable, to require by subpoena, or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, has the resolution been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. McCORMICK. It has.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me interrupt at this point to say that the resolution is amended by the committee to read "five Senators, two of whom shall be members of the minority."

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the Senator and the committee reporting the resolution consider the advisability of having a joint committee or commission upon which both Houses of Congress would be represented?

Mr. McCORMICK. No. During the last session I attempted, I remember, to secure the consent of the House to the creation of a joint commission on another subject, and the House objected so strenuously that I saw no good reason to seek to create a joint commission to investigate this question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have no intention of objecting to the consideration of this resolution. For some time I have felt that there should be an investigation of conditions in Haiti and the Dominican Republic respecting their occupation by the forces of the United States; but I suggest to the Senator from Illinois and to the Senate that inasmuch as any legislative action which may be taken hereafter in connection with the subject will require the concurrence of the body at the other end of the Capitol, it would be worth while to consider having both Houses represented upon the investigating committee.

We frequently find ourselves in this position: A special committee of one House or the other makes an investigation into some subject and recommends action respecting it. The other body is without the special information which is obtained by the special committee of the House making the investigation, and nothing substantial results from the investigation.

I have no intention of objecting to the consideration of the resolution; but I make that suggestion for whatever the Senator from Illinois may think it worth.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President—

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GERRY. I think a little further consideration ought to be given to this resolution. I see that it was only reported from the committee on the 22d instant, which was Friday last; and therefore I object.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCORMICK. In the light of the objection, I was going to yield the floor to the Senator from Georgia, or any Senator who might desire it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. May I ask the Senator if it is not also true that we have had our marines in occupation of Nicaragua for some years?

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, I think so.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Should we not find out why that is done and when it is going to be discontinued?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I could engage in a disquisition upon the military occupations of Nicaragua and Pekin and Yap and the Philippines, but it would take an hour.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Nobody has asked for a disquisition upon the subject.

Mr. McCORMICK. This resolution looks to an investigation of the occupation and administration of certain territory.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Is not that true of Nicaragua also?

Mr. McCORMICK. No.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. My understanding is that it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course the unfinished business has not been formally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to ask unanimous consent to lay it aside temporarily if there had been no objection to the consideration of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Illinois. It is necessary to have an executive session.

MALT LIQUORS AND WINES FOR MEDICINAL PURPOSES.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator is about to make a motion to go into executive session, I hope he will yield to me for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to introduce, out of order, a resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read for the information of the Senate, in order that I may ask further unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 117), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the regulations which are reported to have been drawn by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, pursuant to an opinion rendered by Attorney General Palmer, to provide for the use of malt liquors and wines for medicinal purposes.

Mr. MOSES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. If it will lead to no debate, I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what is this resolution?

Mr. MOSES. It is a resolution asking that the Secretary of the Treasury transmit to the Senate a copy of the regulations which we have been repeatedly told have been drawn by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, pursuant to Attorney General Palmer's opinion, for the use of malt liquors and wines for medicinal purposes; and it occurs to me that if, upon the disposition of the Norris bill, we should take up the so-called beer bill it might be desirable for the Senate to have this information before it. It may be that these regulations will make legislation unnecessary without casting any stigma upon the honorable profession of medicine or the equally honorable calling of the apothecary.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the resolution include, also, any regulations that have been promulgated in pursuance of any opinion by the present Attorney General?

Mr. MOSES. I think none have been promulgated, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. That is why I made the inquiry. If there have been any, it seems to me they should be included also.

Mr. MOSES. I am very certain that none have been. I think everything has been awaiting the determination of the policy of Congress, and in order to determine the policy of Congress it may be desirable to know what the policy of the Treasury Department is to be. At any rate, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not think the resolution ought to be considered at this late hour.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Minnesota object?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over, under the rule.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 26, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 25, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, Thou hast given us rest within the shadows of Thy divine care and opened for us the gates of the morning. Be merciful unto our imperfections and give strength to those with whom temptation is too subtle or too strong. In our busiest hours direct us, in our loneliest moments give us good cheer, and may gratitude be the language of our hearts and happiness the music of our souls. Continue to be the guide and the guardian of our country and give depth and power to the traditional fundamentals of our Government. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, July 21, 1921, was read and approved.

LOAN OF TENTS, ETC.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 163, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Eighty-eighth Division Association for their reunion at Des Moines, Iowa, tents, cots, mattresses, blankets, and galvanized-iron buckets, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 163) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Eighty-eighth Division Association for their reunion at Des Moines, Iowa, tents, cots, mattresses, blankets, and galvanized-iron buckets.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to the Eighty-eighth Division Association the following equipment: Sufficient tentage for 10,000 men, 10,000 iron cots, 10,000 mattresses, 20,000 blankets, and 1,000 galvanized-iron buckets for use during their encampment at Des Moines, Iowa, August 26, 27, and 28, 1921: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to said city designated at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the secretary of said organization: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before the delivery of such property, take from said organization a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, the whole transaction to be without expense to the Government of the United States of America.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 5, page 1, after the word "equipment," insert "or as much thereof as may be available."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this matter been before the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. DOWELL. The Committee on Military Affairs has unanimously reported the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Is this a reported resolution?

Mr. DOWELL. A reported resolution.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Iowa states, this resolution was before the Committee on Military Affairs and it received unanimously a favorable report from that committee. Most of the things loaned under the resolution are right upon the ground. They can be taken from the warehouse at Camp Dodge and used for the purposes intended in the resolution.

Mr. DOWELL. This meeting is at the place where this division was trained during the war before it went to France, and most of this equipment is now at Camp Dodge.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1039. An act for the public protection of maternity and infancy, and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 1039. An act for the public protection of maternity and infancy, and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

THE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, under the right of the reservation of objection, I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a question—and I do not intend to object to the consideration of the resolution. I think the gentleman from Wyoming would render a very great favor and a courtesy, to which I think the House is entitled, if he would tell the House what he expects to do for the next week or 10 days in the way of legislation. Many Members have asked me on this side what we are going to do and I can not tell them. I think the gentleman should give all of the information he can in order that they may accommodate themselves to this program.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to do that as far as I can. My understanding is that the Committee on Rules will bring in a rule this morning which will make in order a bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs having to do with a variety of matters touching the naval service. That rule will also make in order a bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs somewhat broadening the organic law of the Indian Service, so as to make in order the ordinary and usual items on the Indian appropriation bill. My understanding is that neither of those bills will, however, be called up immediately, but that the Committee on Military Affairs will, after the adoption of the rule, call up, one after the other, the two bills for which they already have the right of way through rules, one a bill authorizing settlement for the taking of certain radio patents by the Government and another relating to cadets at West Point.

Before those military bills are called up the chairman of the Committee on Accounts may present some small items from his committee.

The day will be occupied probably with those bills from the Committee on Military Affairs. One of them may go over until to-morrow, or it is possible that to-morrow we will take up one of the two bills made in order to-day.

On Calendar Wednesday the call rests with the Committee on Agriculture, and if no other arrangement be made that committee will have the call.

On Thursday we hope to take up, unless we do it earlier, the bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs to which I have already referred.

On Friday, if we are in session, it is hoped that we may take up bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, although it is possible, in view of the fact that the rule reported from the Committee on Rules is not as broad as had been anticipated, that we may ask unanimous consent to take up bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to to-morrow instead of on Friday.

The Committee on Appropriations has before it a very important matter of an estimate for the Shipping Board. I have no knowledge at present how soon they will be prepared to report to the House on that bill, whether this week or not; possibly not until the first of next week.

There are two bills now in conference—one the so-called Sweet bill, for the consolidation of agencies having to do with ex-service men, and the other the packer bill. The conference reports on those measures will be considered when they come to the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Yesterday in the press appeared a detailed statement, purporting to come from the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], giving us a daily program for the next two weeks. It was stated that it was given for the benefit of the Congress. Has that program been changed in any way by the gentleman's statement?

Mr. MONDELL. That program has been changed in this way: Gentlemen often ask why we can not have programs, so that we may know in advance what we are going to do. The difficulty about that is that even those who know most about what the program might be must be governed not altogether by their own will, but by what the House and the committees of the House desire or conclude to do.

When the statement the gentleman referred to was given out I anticipated that the Committee on Rules would also make in order two bills from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, having to do with standards of measures. The committee did not see fit to include those two bills in its rule. Barring those two bills, the statement given out yesterday is as near as we can approximate the work for the next 10 days. I gave that out because I thought it was my duty to let gentlemen know as nearly as possible what we were likely to do.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman ought to be commended for it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Do I understand the naval bill will have the call on Thursday?

Mr. MONDELL. When I anticipated that we might have a rule on four bills, instead of on two, it was my thought that we would take up one of the bills from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to-morrow.

But in view of the fact that the Committee on Rules did not include that bill in their rule, I thought that perhaps if it were satisfactory to the Committee on Naval Affairs we might take up their bill to-morrow. I can only say in regard to that, after consulting with gentlemen on both sides in regard to it, because the understanding has been that we take up that bill Thursday, if I find it is not agreeable to take up the bill from the Naval Committee to-morrow, I may submit a unanimous-consent request to take up bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, with the expectation in that event to stand in recess from Thursday until Monday, as there are quite a number of gentlemen who are very anxious to be out of the city to attend important celebrations on Friday and Saturday. Of course, that will not be done except after consultation with Members on both sides.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. CARTER. What time does the gentleman think we might expect the revenue bill?

Mr. MONDELL. In two or three weeks.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman expect the Military Affairs Committee to call up its bills to-day and to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. That is my thought. My thought was that the committee might dispose of both of their bills to-day.

Mr. KAHN. We will try.

Mr. MONDELL. If they do not, one bill will go over until to-morrow, when the suggestion in regard to calling up bills on the Private Calendar might not be made.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not hear the statement given to the press that the gentleman made reference to a moment ago, nor did I hear all the statement made from the floor, but there was a rule adopted some time ago, as I remember it, to make in order the consideration of a patent bill.

Mr. MONDELL. It has not been my thought to consider that bill just at this time, because some gentlemen much interested in that bill are not here.

Mr. BLANTON. And some opposed to it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. WINGO. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the bill from the Banking and Currency Committee reported on Saturday?

Mr. MONDELL. My thought was as there is opposition to that measure in the committee and on the floor that we could not take it up within the next few days, because, very frankly, there are many Members absent, and my thought has been to avoid taking up any question that would be very sharply controverted.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit this suggestion? Of course, there is some opposition to it, and those who favor that bill would not be disposed to take snap judgment on anybody, but they would not be inclined to be overindulgent to gentlemen who would not be here, because the bill if passed at all ought to be passed at once.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course the bill was reported Saturday and there are bills on the calendar reported a month and more ago. There are bills on the calendar unanimously reported. The bill was reported by a narrow margin, and in the ordinary course of events a bill coming before the House in that way would not be considered with other bills pressing which have been before us for a long time. I have no doubt but what within a reasonable time it will be taken up.

Mr. WINGO. It was not reported by a narrow margin.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, if I understand the gentleman from Wyoming, it is that until the revenue bill is brought before the House by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] he proposes to take up this little chicken-feed stuff to which there is no opposition comparatively and kill time until Mr. FORDNEY gets ready to bring in a revenue bill.

Mr. MONDELL. That is hardly a fair statement, may I suggest.

Mr. GARNER. That is what it amounts to. Does it not look that way?

Mr. MONDELL. These bills are not of the great national importance that some other legislation is, but they relate to legislation that should be considered.

Mr. GARNER. I understand this legislation from the Committee on Military Affairs and Committee on Indian Affairs and the Naval Affairs Committee is to prepare for appropriation bills that will come next fall, and very properly so, and I think this legislation that the gentleman speaks of ought to be passed, but I understand the gentleman does not propose to take up anything over which there is a real contest until the revenue legislation is reported.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say what I said to the gentleman from Arkansas, that we hope to avoid for some few days questions which are sharply controverted.

Mr. WINGO. May I conclude my interrogatory? I suggest to the gentleman that the bill I had in mind was not reported by a narrow margin. It is not in the attitude of a good many bills he suggests. It is an emergency bill, and, of course, if there are other bills of an emergency character reported prior to this bill that ought to be considered first—

Mr. MONDELL. But in this bill there is involved the grave question as to whether we are going to raise interest rates in the United States.

Mr. WINGO. The Secretary of the Treasury has already settled that.

Mr. MONDELL. It is naturally a question that would arouse a great deal of interest, and to which there would be some opposition, and in that state of affairs we would hardly bring in a bill of that kind so soon after it was reported when a program had been arranged before the bill was reported.

Mr. WINGO. I was not suggesting that. I will say the question the gentleman suggests has already been settled by the Secretary of the Treasury. If he had not opposed for three years governmental loans at 5½, the committee would not have reported the bill. The committee was opposed to it unanimously until the Secretary of the Treasury raised the interest rate.

Mr. POUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If I have the floor.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman in all candor whether it is the expectation or intention to keep the House in continuous session during the dog days until the tax bill is reported from the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. MONDELL. It is my opinion that there is sufficient important legislation already reported, and that is likely to be reported, to take up the time of the House until the tax bill shall have been reported, and that we could not well stand in recess for any considerable period of time without neglecting important matters which should have consideration and bills in conference, as for instance the Sweet bill, which is likely to be here from conference almost any day.

We ought not to be in recess when that bill comes from conference. The packer bill is likely to be here most any time. The Appropriations Committee is considering a matter affecting the Shipping Board that is very urgent and that must be taken care of in some way soon. There is also the bill from the Committee on Banking and Currency gentlemen have referred to.

Mr. MANN. I know; but, after all, that does not answer the question.

Mr. MONDELL. I am calling attention to the condition of the work of the House.

Further than that, there are certain measures that must be agreed upon before we pass our appropriation bills next winter. The bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs is one; the bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs is another. We can not say to these committees, from whom we have taken the appropriating function, that they shall never have their day in the House; that they shall never have an opportunity to present their legislation. My hope is that after we pass the tax bill we can get away for some little period, with our calendars fairly well cleared, and without anything on hand that requires immediate action. But in the meantime we must act on these matters, some of them of first importance and of primary importance, and some of them comparatively unimportant, perhaps, from a national standpoint, yet of sufficient importance that, take it all together, we would not be justified in standing in recess except as we adjourn over Saturdays, which I hope to be able to do, and possibly even over Fridays if we are not pressed too hard.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. It is very convenient for those who live here to adjourn from Thursday to Monday, but as to those who want to get away for a while I would rather stay in session every Saturday and dispatch this immensely important "chicken-feed" business and get through and let some of us go home.

What I have to say is, that if, as I understand the gentleman, the House remains in session through the dog days, God help the country.

Mr. GARNER. I think the membership would be very much interested in this. Let me ask the gentleman—

Mr. MONDELL. Before I yield I want to say this in answer to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] just said. I do not take quite the view of the work of Congress that the gentleman's remark would seem to indicate he does. I think he does not really take the view that "God help the country when the Congress is in session." I think if Congress stays in session it will be doing excellent work, and work which, while it may not all be of great importance from the viewpoint of some gentlemen, is work that must be done.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I think the membership, considering the dog days and also the end of the dog days, would be interested to know whether the gentleman has courage enough—I think the term is justified—to take a recess after the revenue bill has been passed? Are you going to take a recess then?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the "gentleman" does not pretend to any special courage.

Mr. GARNER. There will be "chicken feed" then.

Mr. MONDELL. The "gentleman from Wyoming" thinks that then we would be in a condition that we could take a considerable recess without in any wise retarding the transaction of public business.

Mr. GARNER. Do you mean a concurrent resolution for the purpose of giving gentlemen opportunity to go home, without being asked on every street corner what they are doing there when Congress is in session, or do you mean three-day recesses under a gentleman's agreement?

Mr. MONDELL. My own thought is, and I have no more to do with it than the gentleman from Texas—

Mr. MANN. Yes; you have.

Mr. GARNER. Yes. The "gentleman from Texas" would be glad to know.

Mr. MONDELL. My thought is that after we pass the tax bill we could not expedite the public business, we could not hurry the final settlement of the two big problems before the Congress, by remaining in session. The tariff and tax bills will both be before the Senate, and we might as well stand adjourned for a time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And my hope is that by that time we may have disposed of these chips and whetstones, as some of the gentlemen call them, and have the decks cleared, so that with a clear conscience and without in any wise retarding the public business we may get home for some little time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Is it not almost certain that by the time the tax bill passes the House you will commence to consider what you will do with the revenue bill when it passes the Senate; that that must be sent to conference?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not anticipate that the revenue bill will have reached much less have passed the Senate at that time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; but the gentleman from Wyoming and other gentlemen here will say then, "How can we afford to be away from here when the revenue bill is passing the Senate? It must be sent to conference at once, and when it is sent to conference we can not afford to be away because the conference report must be acted upon as soon as it is called up." The fact is that now is the only time that it is safe to take a recess. Shortly after the tax bill passes the House, a month or six weeks or two months from now, we will have the revenue bill back.

Mr. MONDELL. The tax bill will pass the House much sooner than the date the gentleman fixes.

Mr. MANN. I hope not. A good tax bill will not pass then if it passes quickly. The sooner it passes the poorer it will be if it passes without consideration in the committee and without consideration in the House. What I said a while ago would then be true, God help the country! [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. It will be bad enough anyway.

Mr. MONDELL. The country is rather impatient about the tax bill, and I think it need not take so long to take off some of the tax burdens.

Mr. MANN. Yes. They want it to be considered as a fair bill, not as a hodgepodge or a guess.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, gentlemen have been considering it—many gentlemen have been considering it for months—and the Treasury Department has been giving it careful consideration. So have Members of Congress. I do not believe that the questions involved in tax legislation are so numerous or so profound that they can not be settled with reasonable promptness. I hope they will be. I hope we will have the bill in here not later than the 15th of next month; at that date at the latest. I also hope and believe it will appreciably lighten the country's tax burdens.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Have the plans progressed sufficiently far in the consideration of the tax bill that the gentleman can tell us whether it is the purpose to consider that bill under a rule that will cut off all amendments?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not conferred with any of the gentlemen who will have direct charge of that matter, and have no opinion in regard to it except I am confident the measure will be fairly and wisely considered.

LOAN OF TENTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] for unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution that has been reported. Is there objection to the present consideration of that resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to the Eighty-eighth Division Association the following equipment: Sufficient tentage for 10,000 men, 10,000 iron cots, 10,000 mattresses, 20,000 blankets, and 1,000 galvanized-iron buckets for use during their encampment at Des Moines, Iowa, August 26, 27, and 28, 1921: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to said city designated at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the secretary of said organization: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before the delivery of such property, take from said organization a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, the whole transaction to be without expense to the Government of the United States of America.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "equipment," insert "or as much thereof as may be available."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DYER. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. I notice in this resolution that it is a loan of Government property—tents, and so forth—to civilians. It is true these men have served their country and have served it gallantly, but I understood the policy of the War Department and the policy of the Committee on Military Affairs is that this equipage, tents, and so forth, could not be loaned to any organization except veteran soldier organizations known as the Grand Army of the Republic, the Confederate Veterans' Association, and I think probably one or two others specially named in legislation. Now, there are a number of organizations in this country that conduct large encampments. Some weeks ago I went to the War Department and to the Committee on Military Affairs and asked whether or not an organization holding an encampment in my city, semimilitary, known as the Modern Woodmen, might have the loan of this equipage. These men are compelled because of large numbers to camp out; they can not go to the hotels. I went, as I say, to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Secretary of War, and I was told that the War Department and the Committee on Military Affairs had established a policy among themselves whereby it would not be possible to loan tents to an organization of that kind, and that it was confined absolutely to the veteran organizations known as the Grand Army of the Republic and the Confederate Veterans' Association.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Now, if it is changed, I think it is fair to all concerned that it should not be limited to specific groups. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Is the gentleman under the impression that this is a veteran organization provided for in this bill?

Mr. DYER. No. I was under the impression that it was confined to the Grand Army of the Republic and the Confederate Veterans.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. No. It is the policy of the War Department to loan what Congress says it shall loan. We could pass various bills through this House. However, the policy of the Committee on Military Affairs is not to loan pillows or cots or mattresses, but to loan tents, and I find they will not deviate from that rule. But with respect to any soldier organization it is the policy of the War Department and of Congress to loan them tents.

Mr. DYER. I am not objecting to the loan of tents and equipage to the organizations referred to. I think they are fully entitled to them. The War Department ought to let them have them without question, and Congress ought to adopt this resolution without question. But I am opposed to this narrow policy on the part of the War Department whereby they refuse to loan these tents, when the expense incident to it does not amount to a penny, to a large organization of citizens of this country such as the Modern Woodmen of America.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The War Department requires that tents shall be loaned to the Grand Army of the Republic, and to the Confederate veterans, and to the Spanish-American War veterans, and also to the veterans of the World War. It limits the loan of the tents to those military organizations. Of course, they say frankly at the War Department that although they loan these tents presumably without any harm to the tents, nevertheless every time the tents are loaned they deteriorate to a certain extent.

Mr. DYER. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that they deteriorate to any extent worth paying attention to. For instance, to show the narrow-mindedness of the present policy of the War Department, the Committee on Military Affairs of the House seems to refuse anything unless the War Department is in favor of it along those lines. They refused to loan tents or to recommend the use of tents that were in my city at St. Louis at no expense whatever; they refuse to allow them to be taken out of storage. They are there in storage, rotting, half of them, and wasting, and this policy is so narrow on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, as recommended by the War Department, that they would not even loan them to the boys coming from the country to that city, but compelled them to sleep in the fields because the policy of the War Department was so narrow.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows perfectly well that the Congress is not going to make a general practice of loaning its equipment to civilians. Now, the Woodmen are a very worthy organization. So are the Masons and the Knights of Pythias—and somebody suggests the Anti-Saloon League—and a lot of other organizations.

Mr. DYER. The Modern Woodmen of America is a large organization that has a military training branch.

Mr. MONDELL. But when you go to loaning equipment to organizations beyond soldiers and veterans you are getting into a field that has no limit, and the gentleman knows that perfectly well. He is making a good speech, that ought to defend him—

Mr. DYER. I am not making any speech to defend myself, but I am making a speech, Mr. Speaker, to criticize what I believe to be a bad policy of this House and of the Secretary of War with reference to such matters.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman stands alone in that view—

Mr. DYER. I do not yield to the gentleman to permit him to lecture me. I am trying if I can to lecture the Committee on Military Affairs of the House and the Secretary of War. Now, the Modern Woodmen are not a little bit of an organization. They have thousands of men who are being trained. They have a military branch, and thousands of men are being trained in it; and training is what we need in this country, as was demonstrated in the Great War; and if the War Department is so narrow, and if the Committee on Military Affairs will not act without the approval of the War Department on such matters as the loaning of tents to an organization that would not hurt the tents as much as they would be hurt by being left to rot in storage, I say that is a bad policy and it ought to be condemned, and I do condemn it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to state to the gentleman from Missouri, for the benefit of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, that he is entirely mistaken about the attitude of that committee. The Secretary of War wrote a very forceful letter in opposition to this bill, saying he did not think it should be approved. The Committee on Military Affairs assumed the responsibility of reporting it to the House and declined to take the advice of the Secretary of War, and denied his request, and reported the resolution favorably. We acted on our own judgment, just as we have acted on our own judgment in denying the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] when he asked us to grant tents to the Modern Woodmen of America.

Mr. DYER. I congratulate the Military Affairs Committee of the House that they have at last become an independent committee, and that they are not going to be absolutely bound by the recommendations of that branch of the War Department which gives these instructions and writes these letters, which is the narrowest department in the whole Government of the United States. I am opposed to it and am glad that the committee have finally agreed to report something that the Secretary of War did not recommend. I commend them for it and hope they will continue to do so.

Mr. BIRD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BIRD. Manifestly there must be a limit somewhere. Where would the gentleman fix that limit?

Mr. DYER. I would fix it in the discretion of Congress, which has the authority to legislate upon it. I say that when a big organization like the one I have referred to comes and asks for the use of tents, where it has a semimilitary branch of which thousands of men are members, there ought not to be any hesitancy about loaning the tents, when, as in the case which I have referred to, the tents are right in the city of St. Louis, where the encampment was being held, thousands of tents in storage, with no use for them, and they are simply lying there rotting away.

In a case like that, why not use common sense and ordinary good judgment, and allow the boys of this land who have been fighting for the country and who are now in this organization to get the use of them for the little while that they want them. Why should they not have these tents? I think the policy of the War Department is foolish and narrow when they refuse so meritorious and worthy a request.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. There was so much confusion on the floor of the House that I could not hear much of what the gentleman said. I did not understand the name of the organization to which the gentleman refers. What is it that the gentleman wants?

Mr. DYER. I do not want anything now. A short time ago I made a request on behalf of the Modern Woodmen of America that held a large encampment in my city of St. Louis last month. As the gentleman knows, they have a large branch that is semimilitary in character. They train young men, they have uniforms, and they are of great benefit in time of war by having so many young men trained.

Mr. WINGO. Would not the War Department and the Committee on Military Affairs grant the request of the gentleman to loan tents to this organization?

Mr. DYER. No. I introduced a resolution providing for the loan of tents, and a great many Members of the House were in favor of it. I took it up with the War Department, and they were opposed to it; said they were opposed to loaning tents, and refused to grant their consent, although there were thousands of tents lying in storage in the city of St. Louis, where the encampment was to be held. It would not have cost them a nickel. The Military Affairs Committee told me, unofficially, that they would not favorably consider the resolution because of the adverse report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not want to leave the impression that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is listening to the dictates of the executive department, does he? That is a serious charge to make against the committee, and the gentleman ought not to make it.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that I was hoping that under the present administration we would get completely away from executive domination such as characterized the last administration.

Mr. WINGO. That is a futile hope, I fear.

Mr. DYER. I believe we will do it eventually, but we have not so far gotten entirely away from it.

Mr. WINGO. I hope the gentleman can bring an end to that unbearable condition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is a man in my district who enlisted during the war and served in the trenches. He owns an old Ford machine and would like to make a trip through the country. He would be very glad to have the Government furnish him with a tent and a stove, cooking utensils, and perhaps loan him some canned food and a few other things of that sort. I have wondered whether he was not as much entitled to the use of Government property as would be two men if they got together and made the request, or 200 or 2,000, if they made a request. Where do you draw the line? I have not noticed any sympathetic expressions in the House about loaning the Government property to this one man. The gentleman from Missouri thinks that we ought to loan the property to everybody, practically, if they come in bunches. If they do a good deal of destruction to a good deal of property, then we ought to let them have the property, but if one man wants it, he is turned down.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventeen Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fifty Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL 5340.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution of the Charles Crammes Post, No. 225, Veterans of Foreign Wars, on the bill H. R. 5340.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Charles Crammes Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, these resolutions ordinarily go through the basket. We do not fill the RECORD up with resolutions of that kind.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I know that is usually so, but in this case there is a particular reason for it, and this is the only one that I have made a request for.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that we ought to establish a precedent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

SURVEY OF YAZOO RIVER, MISS.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5651) to survey the Yazoo River, Miss., with a view to a control of its floods, with Senate amendments.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendments.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

House resolution 159.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the following bills: H. R. 7864, a bill providing for sundry matters affecting the Naval Establishment; H. R. 7848, a bill authorizing appropriations and expenditures for the administration of Indian affairs, and for other purposes; H. R. 7102, a bill to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes; H. R. 7103, a bill to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes.

The consideration of the bills made in order under this rule shall not displace business provided for on special days nor interfere with business reported from the Committee on Ways and Means or the Committee on Appropriations.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 8, page 1, strike out the remainder of line 8, after the word "purposes" and insert a period in lieu of the semicolon.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolution as amended provides for the consideration of a bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs; also the Committee on Indian Affairs. Gentlemen will recall that during the consideration of the last Indian appropriation bill, providing for the activities of the Government with respect to the Indians, points of order were made to many of the items carried in the bill. Those points of order were sustained. The purpose of this rule is to enable the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Indian Affairs to at any time move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of these two bills.

The Committee on Rules did not report favorably for the consideration of the bills from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures provided for in the resolution as introduced.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear clearly what the gentleman said with reference to the purpose of the rule, but is it the idea of the Committee on Rules that we shall pass legislation to permit committees to do something that the rules of the House prevent them from doing now?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The idea of the Committee on Rules and of the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs, which preceded the idea of the Committee on Rules, is that the legislative committee on Naval Affairs should legislate and put upon the statute books such legislation as has heretofore been carried from year to year in the Naval Affairs appropriation bill, and the same thing is true of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Legislation is not in order from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH. It will not be in order after this bill passes, will it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It will then be in order for the Committee on Appropriations to pass the appropriation bills and meet the requirements of the Navy Department and the requirements of the Indian Office without objections due to points of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The passage of this bill will not, of course, make legislation in order on appropriation bills in the future.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But this will make permanent law if the naval bill passes and the Indian bill passes to include in the appropriation bills what has heretofore been commonly carried in them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill that has been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs is simply a broadening of the organic law of the Indian Bureau so that it will make in order on an appropriation bill the usual items that have long been carried in the appropriation bill. It is not the purpose of anyone to in any way widen the jurisdiction further than the jurisdiction has heretofore been assumed in reporting the ordinary items in respect to the Indian Bureau.

Mr. WALSH. That is the third version.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is only one version. The Committee on Appropriations is not authorized to bring in legislative items. We are making it possible for the legislative committees to bring in legislation which will make in order items ordinarily and commonly heretofore carried in appropriation bills.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. These bills as I read them merely contain authority for appropriations.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. They have nothing to do with the rules of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Nothing whatever.

Mr. WALSH. They contain certain authority for appropriations.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; and the appropriations are not now in order without that authority.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the rule, it makes it in order to proceed with the consideration of these bills at once.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is that the intention?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not the intention, I believe, to at once move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on either of those bills.

Mr. MANN. What is coming up now?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the Committee on Military Affairs will go on with some matters they have been considering under a similar rule to the one now under consideration.

Mr. MANN. Under a prior rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The difficulty with these rules is that a man must not merely be familiar with the rules of the House, but he must follow up all of the time the Committee on Rules, hang to the coat tail of the gentleman from Kansas, in order to know what is coming up in the House. That is one of the great reforms that grew out of the claim some years ago that the Speaker had too much power.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. At that time one could find out what was coming up. I heard the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] this morning interrogated and he did not seem to know what is coming up. He side-stepped the proposition with his usual skill, and he is a very skillful gentleman. Now, the gentleman from Kansas comes in with a rule to make something else in order, but says that that something else is not coming up. It may come up next fall, I suppose, sometime—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It may come up next week.

Mr. MANN. And we do not know what will be run in between this and the time when these measures come up. The gentleman may bring in something else that has been partly disposed of heretofore, coming over from last month. In other words, we never have anything on the dot, but always work backward.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I regret to say did not give me his attention.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I listened to every word the gentleman said. Of course I lack the intelligence of the gentleman from Wyoming, though I supposed that a man who is so much more intelligent than I could talk more plainly.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not lack intelligence. In fact he is rather more richly endowed with intelligence than most of us.

Mr. MANN. I lack understanding of what is coming up.

Mr. MONDELL. The truth is, the gentleman is in a critical mood this morning.

Mr. MANN. It is the dog days and it is going to be the dog days a long while, and I am not the only one in the House, either.

Mr. MONDELL. I am afraid the gentleman did not listen.

Mr. MANN. I know what the gentleman said. The gentleman said he did not know what was coming up.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, no one Member of the House knows absolutely what is coming up—

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knew but he would not tell.

Mr. MONDELL. We are bringing this rule in in order that gentlemen might know what the program would be for the next week or so. The gentleman from Wyoming has been importuned time and time again by Members, very properly, as to what we are going to do, what is going to be the program. Now, we are endeavoring to arrive at a program so far as we can, and this rule is a part of the plan, and within a few days the bills made in order will be brought up.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I appreciate how very important these bills are.

Mr. MONDELL. They are.

Mr. MANN. The country is just waiting breathless for the disposition of these two bills made in order at some time by this rule, although I had not supposed people would cease breathing because the rule was not passed and the bills were not brought up, and now having determined they are so important they now determine they shall not come up until some later day—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I direct the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that we are waiting for some very important matters, and while we are waiting, even during the dog days, we can consider these matters?

Mr. MANN. We are killing time and wasting the time of the House and of the country trying to fool the people, and they know it. [Applause.] We pretend to be doing business, when we are not. We are wasting time, instead of having courage enough to quit a while and go home. We are wasting time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he seriously contends that it is not important that both of these bills shall be enacted into law before taking up and considering the appropriation bills next fall?

Mr. MANN. It is not important whether they are ever taken up, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, it is; it is important.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly familiar with the subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Indian appropriation bill passed the House at the last Congress with practically nothing in it.

Mr. MANN. And yet it became a law with all these things in it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, that was in another body and not—

Mr. MANN. It became a law with all those things in it. It is simply the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield right there.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am as much affected by the dog days as my friend from Illinois, and I have the same longings at this moment that he has, but I shall not be able to gratify them.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman will be able to gratify them. The difficulty is I am not a part of the organization of the House. I do not have to bow my head. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I can express my honest opinion in the House, and I could not do that when I was a Republican leader in the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the gentleman did it anyhow.

Mr. MANN. And even then I had courage enough to quit when we got through. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Illinois speaks of the bills which passed the House—the Indian appropriation bill and the naval bill. I want to call to his attention that by reason of the form in which those bills came to the House they were emasculated, and the Senate really appropriated the money under our rules.

Mr. MANN. It was by special vote. This is the first time practically in the history of the House that the House had a chance to vote on real items in an appropriation bill. The Senate added a lot of amendments, inserting items stricken out on points of order made by members of the committee, and when they came back to the House each of those items had to be voted upon in the House, and for the first time since I have been a Member of the House the House actually voted—actually voted on these questions. [Applause.]

But I do not think it hurt the House any. Of course, the House was just like this, with thumbs up and thumbs down, when men in charge of the bill made it thumbs up or thumbs down.

Mr. BUTLER. I wonder if any of us can be saved. [Laughter.] Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question or two?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I think I am the only one who has his senses here this morning.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to yield time if the gentleman from Kansas will yield me time.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand if this rule is adopted we will get along with the bill which the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has. I hope, then, to-morrow, if the gentleman will permit me to express the wish, that the gentleman will obtain permission to consider bills on the Private Calendar to which there is no objection.

Mr. MANN. You will have to bring in a rule for that.

Mr. BUTLER. And then on Thursday next I will ask permission to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill reported by the Naval Committee.

Mr. MONDELL. As I said a moment ago, it was our hope that the gentleman might bring his bill up on Thursday.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the Members that it is highly desirable for them to be here next Thursday, because in all my service there has been no more important bill to the country than the bill I will offer at that time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman regards it as important?

Mr. BUTLER. Very, very important. We held it back and considered it with great care, and finally were compelled by necessity to report it.

Mr. WALSH. Is that a bill to increase the cost of some of these battleships?

Mr. BUTLER. I will say now that the gentleman has put the question to me, yes. Will the gentleman permit me to add to my answer this, that only in two cases, in the case of two ships, while the increase was asked for six. We declined in the case of four, hoping in the future we could work it off without increasing the cost of the ships. The obligations are out.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the resolution the gentleman has offered in any way affect the jurisdiction of the legislative committee or transfer any part of that jurisdiction to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all. On the contrary, it is preserving to the legislative committees their jurisdiction.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As I understand the rule, the conference report is not affected by it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. So that if the conference report on the Sweet bill comes in, which we are all anxiously waiting for, that may be disposed of. That having been disposed of, perhaps the most important bill outside of the tariff and the revenue bills will have been disposed of.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Illinois might have added the packers' bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not the packers' bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; that also will come in.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. According to the statement of the gentleman the other day, we will cross that bridge when we come to it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman has spoken about the importance of certain bills. Does not the gentleman think the bonus bill is about as important as anything that we could consider?

Mr. BLANTON. Will this rule the gentleman has proposed in any way affect matters of legislation that appear upon any of the other appropriation bills, like the sundry civil bill or the legislative bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. BLANTON. It will not make in order any legislation on any of those bills?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; not unless it is legislation affecting the Naval Establishment or Indian affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope, if the gentleman will permit—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can not yield further.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not begrudge the gentleman this extra power he has assumed.

Mr. BUTLER. This bill is purely a legislative bill. It involves an appropriation of money, not made by the Naval Affairs Committee, but authorizes the committee for a specific purpose, if it sees fit, to report an appropriation. But it does not in any way affect the jurisdiction of either committee, the Appropriations Committee or the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. SEARS. My good friend has just stated that the cost of some of these ships will be increased. I was wondering if any of them will be used for bombing purposes without dismantling them first?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman should refer that to somebody else. I do not know what they are going to do with these ships. I know they are not going to fight them after we have our conference.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Even though we are in the midst of dog days, nothing has been advanced against agreeing to the resolution. I therefore yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the minority of the Committee on Rules did not see any special necessity for the adoption of this special rule, and yet did not feel that there was sufficient reason to object. It seems that we are in a situation where nobody will indicate the program of legislation to be enacted, and yet the situation of the country is, to put it mildly, the most desperate since 1907. I do not know how it is in other parts of the country, but I do not believe there is one cotton producer in the State I in part represent who even hopes to get the cost of production when he sells his commodity when placed upon the market. Yet with this situation confronting the country we are constantly hearing about three-day adjournments, and leaders of the majority now and then announce that because gentlemen have important business elsewhere we must adjourn over from Friday or Thursday until the following Monday. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that this is one hour in the life of the Republic when no Member of this body can have any business more important than staying here in Washington and attending to his duties. [Applause.]

I do not know what the answer of the majority is going to be to the cry of distress that is going up from every part of the country. Nobody but a lunatic ought to expect relief from the Fordney tariff bill. It may be that some measure of relief will be afforded by the tax bill which the Ways and Means Committee is at this moment said to be considering. The country is anxiously hoping so. And there is no reason why the membership of this body should not remain here and consider that tax bill under the general rules of the House. Of course, when it is reported out by the Ways and Means Committee we will go through the usual routine; the Rules Committee will be called together and a special rule will be framed which will fix the time for a vote, which will cut off amendments, and which will put the framing of the bill as well as all amendments into the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the majority members of his committee.

And yet this is the great measure which is expected to bring relief to the millions of this country who are in a worse condition to-day than they have been since 1907, during the Roosevelt panic. It is time that somebody was getting busy. It is time Members and particularly leaders of this House quit talking about going away and taking recesses. It is time to quit talking about Members having important business which takes them away from Washington. The suggestion of making this Nation a sporting playground is particularly inappropriate right now.

So far as the minority is concerned, we stand ready to remain on the job and cooperate with you during dog days and during days that are not dog days. Of course, we are just as anxious to get away as anybody. A vacation is just as beneficial to the minority as it is to the majority. But I respectfully submit that the situation throughout the country, in every line of endeavor, in business, in agriculture, in manufacturing, with almost 2,000,000 men idle and out of employment—

Mr. LINTHICUM. Five million men—

Mr. POU. Yes; I stand corrected; 5,000,000 men out of employment, including ex-service men, walking the streets, begging for any sort of a job; it is time that the majority realized the necessity for action. The majority leader should issue a summons to the membership on your side, as our leader will do to the membership on our side, to stay on the job until some attempt is made to relieve the condition of distress which is driving men to desperation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I realize that Congress having been in session since the 11th of April and working continuously, the weather having been unusually warm and uncomfortable, many Members of the House are desirous of taking a recess and having a vacation, a temporary relief from the burdens of the session. I hope I sympathize with that view, although I am one of those who never go home during the sessions of Congress. There has been a good deal of discussion of the propriety and wisdom of recesses for two or three weeks until the revenue bill shall be ready. I would be very glad, indeed, to approve of that program if the situation with regard to the work of Congress was one to warrant it. But I do not believe it is. There are two important bills in conference, one very important bill, a bill in which all of the ex-service men are interested and in which we are all interested with them. It is very important that we should be in session when that bill—the Sweet bill—reaches the House, in order that we may agree to the conference report. All of the gentleman present may not agree as to the virtues of the packers' bill, but it is an important bill, and we should all be here to dispose of that conference report also when it comes to us.

Further than that, this House quite recently very radically changed its rules in regard to appropriations. We took from seven important committees the right to appropriate and lodged that power in one great committee. If that plan shall prove successful—and we hope it will—it can only prove successful if we shall preserve fully and definitely the legislative jurisdiction of the committees that no longer appropriate. If the new policy shall be a success, it can only be in case we shall give those committees having important legislative jurisdiction an opportunity to present their legislation from time to time to the House. We have been very busy so far this session with other matters, and up to this time of these committees only the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Agriculture have had an opportunity to present their legislative matters to the House. The Committee on Naval Affairs is a very important committee of the House; I think just as important a committee now as it was when it appropriated, if we shall clearly and definitely preserve its legislative authority. But it is bootless to preserve its legislative authority if we do not give the committee an opportunity from time to time to present its legislative proposals to the House.

For a month or more I have been endeavoring to find a time when we could give the Committee on Naval Affairs an opportunity to present some of its important problems to the House for its consideration.

When we reported the appropriation bills in the last session of the former Congress there were plenty of gentlemen in the House who prophesied that we would never pass our appropriation bills within the session; they said we could not do it under the conditions then existing. I was told repeatedly that it was an impossibility; that it could not be done and would not be done. But, thanks to the industry and good judgment of the House, we did dispose of our appropriation program. With the exception of the Army bill, which failed by reason of a presidential pocket veto, and the naval bill, which did not pass the Senate, with these exceptions our entire appropriation program was disposed of. But we labored under a very great handicap. The committees that have heretofore had joint legislative and appropriating authority had failed to provide the legislation necessary to make all the ordinary and usual items on their appropriation bills in order. They had depended on the good nature of the House to get by. But under the conditions that existed in the last Congress practically every point of order was made that could be made, with the result that some of our appropriation bills, as they left the House, were as full of holes as a skimmer. Manifestly we can not go on indefinitely in that way. Even though we were to reverse our judgment of last winter and go back to the old program of appropriations, it would be necessary even in that event, now that the attention of Congress has been called to these questions, to have the ordinary and usual and essential items of appropriation bills made in order by law.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. There is not one word, not one line or sentence in the bill that the Committee on Naval Affairs has reported, as embraced in this rule, that remedies, or seeks to remedy, or is intended to remedy that situation.

Mr. MONDELL. I referred to the naval bill a moment ago. I am now talking about the Indian appropriation bill. I have not at any time indicated that there was anything in the bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs that in any way affected the matter I am now discussing.

Mr. PADGETT. The chairman of the Committee on Rules, I think, so stated.

Mr. MONDELL. I have stated nothing of the sort, but I understand an amendment is likely to be offered to the naval bill covering that feature and that is no doubt what the gentleman from Kansas had in mind.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I said it should be in.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs is intended to cover the usual and necessary items for the Indian Service. It is absolutely essential that that bill be passed, and that we write it on the statute books at as early a date as possible.

Some suggestions have been made that this legislation is not important. Everything we are proposing to do in the next week or 10 days is important. There is difference in the relative importance of legislation, the relative importance depending somewhat on gentlemen's opinions. Some gentlemen are of the opinion that the bills on the Private Calendar are important, and they are important; and from the standpoint of those interested and entitled to fair treatment from the Government they are just as important as anything we do here. I am just as anxious to give the Private Calendar its day in the House, and opportunity for consideration, as I am to have the important public legislation disposed of.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Let me ask the gentleman what is the purpose of the naval bill mentioned in the rule? What does it propose to do?

Mr. MONDELL. It provides for a variety of matters of importance relating to the Naval Establishment. I have no doubt that the gentleman has read the bill. If he has not, he can read it and he ought to read it.

Mr. BUTLER. It relates to sundry matters.

Mr. MONDELL. At one time and another gentlemen have discussed the matter of a House program. I realize how tremendously important it is that we should know as far in advance as possible what legislation we are to take up. I am very much interested in having that done, because I am anxious to have the Members of the House study the bills before they are taken up, and I very frequently call the attention of gentlemen to this bill, that bill, or the other and ask them to study them and be prepared to present their views on them when they shall be taken up for consideration. Unfortunately it is very difficult to determine far in advance absolutely and beyond question just what we shall do. On Saturday last I made an attempt to do that for a period covering some 10 days, and owing to the fact that the Committee on Rules did not entirely agree with me that guess went somewhat awry; but in the main the statement which I made indicates about what we will do in the next 10 days, and it is my purpose to suggest as far in advance as I may what we probably will take up for consideration. Of course, conditions are constantly changing. A committee may at any time report a bill that deals with a situation that is so much of an emergency, and it may be necessary to change the program entirely in order to give such a piece of legislation the right of way. Gentlemen who are greatly interested in measures that we intend to take up are sometimes necessarily absent on a certain day, and in such a case it is sometimes necessary, or at least reasonable, that the matter should be put over until it is possible for them to be present. Many things occur that interfere with any program; but I will say, not in apology or defense, but because it is the fact, that we have known more definitely in advance from the beginning of this Congress what the program was to be than at any time since I have been in the Congress. So far as I shall have anything to say with regard to the procedure, I hope I may be fortunate enough to be able to make a reasonably fair guess as to the program and to be able to inform the Members relative thereto. I regret the Committee on Rules did not make in order all four of the bills specified in the rule they reported; that would have given us a longer definite program.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield me a little time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would like to move the previous question as soon as possible. How much time would the gentleman from Tennessee like?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like five minutes at least.

Mr. POU. How much of my ten minutes did I use?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks only five minutes.

Mr. POU. I intended to reserve the remainder of my time and I ask unanimous consent that I may do so now. I want to yield three minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pou] has five minutes to his credit.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, however important may be the legislative matters contained in the naval bill and the Indian bill, there is no one who undertakes to make any pretense that there is anything emergent about them. Sir, for about two weeks we considered a bill that more vitally affects, directly and indirectly, more people in the United States than any bill that this Congress will consider, not even excepting the tax or revenue bill that is to come. The tariff measure, which finally passed the House last Thursday, was considered under a rule and a practice that prevented the House from ever reaching any amendments except amendments that were offered by Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. The only opportunity that any other Member of the House ever had to offer an amendment was when he could offer an amendment to one of those amendments. We now start in on a period in which confessedly there is nothing emergent to do, and we are taking up what the gentleman from Wyoming himself has described as chips and whetstones.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming has not referred to them as chips and whetstones.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Perhaps I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Some other gentleman used that expression. The gentleman from Wyoming believes they are important matters.

Mr. BUTLER. It was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who used that expression.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, I do not want to put words in the gentleman's mouth that he did not use, and I very cheerfully withdraw them. I feel very much tempted to use that expression myself with regard to the consideration of these things that are in this rule at this particular time. The House could have done infinitely better if it had left that tariff bill open here and had given us an opportunity to consider it by offering amendments. [Applause.] What was done to the bill upon those propositions that the House had an opportunity to amend indicates that it might possibly have been made a somewhat decent bill, or at least a better bill, if the House could have had the opportunity which was denied it by the action of the overwhelming majority. And let me say here that no person who voted to hog tie that side of the House and the House entirely by voting for that rule can escape his responsibility for it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman must not forget the occasion when he prevented gentlemen from offering amendments to the chemical schedule by interrupting the reading in the middle of a paragraph. Had that paragraph been completed, amendments would undoubtedly have been offered to it as well as to other paragraphs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no. What would have been offered would have been some committee amendment. I am certain that no Member of the House other than a Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee would have had an opportunity to offer an amendment to the chemical schedule. The gentleman says I prevented it. As a matter of fact, what happened was, I rose to ask for recognition. I was within my rights, and the Chair held that although I was entitled to ask for recognition I was not entitled to have it, and immediately recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], a member of the committee, who offered the preferential amendment. The gentleman knows that what I sought to do was to get that preferential amendment out of the way so the ordinary Member of the House might possibly have an opportunity to offer an amendment. We did not succeed. You adjourned two or three days at 4 o'clock in the afternoon because you did not have enough committee amendments to take up the balance of the day, and you were unwilling to give the ordinary Member of the House an opportunity to offer an amendment. You read about 26 lines of the bill out of more than 8,000 for amendment, and now you come in and propose to spend two or three weeks in dealing with these things not at all emergent while waiting for more material for grist from the Ways and Means Committee.

Now, as far as this special rule is concerned, we of the minority have no opposition to it now. But let me say this, that the Committee on Rules did strike out two of the propositions included in the resolution as introduced. They were trying to pile up too much of this stuff all at once. We at least expect to sort of feel our way on the measures and not have the calendar swamped with preferential stuff that is unimportant.

I want to say that while we are not resisting this rule at this time, yet until these matters already provided for from the Military Affairs Committee are concluded, and matters provided for in this rule are concluded, unless there does arise some real emergency, not some pretended emergency, I think the minority will be disposed to oppose the bringing in of further rules.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Coming back to this matter of program to give the House an opportunity to know what is to be taken up, the two bills that were contained in the rule to which objection was made by the minority and which were stricken out are rather important. There is no very great difference of opinion on them. They have to do with the standards of weights and measures, and it seems to me that the Committee on Rules might very well have let the House understand that within the next two weeks these would be among the measures considered. It would have given the Members an opportunity to study these bills.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say that the Committee on Rules is here and can take these matters up if it is deemed important to take them up; but we want something real to come in here, and the country wants something real to come in. The minority is ready to cooperate in trying to do something real, but the minority is getting tired of dealing with relatively unimportant matters while the country is suffering and begging the Republican Party to do something of value for the relief of almost universal distress.

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, usually I am in hearty accord with the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], but to-day I sincerely believe that if we were to put just the Sweet soldiers' relief bill and the Volstead antibeer bill into law and then adjourn Congress sine die there would be universal rejoicing throughout the United States to-morrow. All of their money would not then pour out of the Treasury. But we can not adjourn. The four newspapers in Washington will not let us. We never would be able to get their consent, so that we have to put that question aside.

I hope that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will not begrudge the little extra power that our friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is daily assuming. When a man has as much power as our great chairman of the great Rules Committee already has, I am not one of those who would begrudge him a little more. He has practically every power in this Nation to-day except one, and he would probably have that in four years from now if it was not for a fact over which he has no control. The place of his birth has kept him from succeeding the President in the White House, but daily he is assuming power and more power. Having as much as he has already, please let him have a little more. But my Republican friends who form this bunch to which some of our leaders refer as "the ordinary Congressman," what are you going to say to your constituents when you go home and they ask you something about these measures that passed the House—about the Fordney measure, for instance—and you tell them that you did not have a thing to do with it? You will be forced to admit that by a special rule brought in by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, passed by your votes, you were deprived of privileges that a Congressman in this body has constitutionally. When you admit that to them, if they are like my people, they will not be satisfied with you. Why have not you got as much right as the leaders of the Ways and Means Committee to speak on matters of important legislation that interests and affects your constituents just as much as they interest and affect the constituents of the Committee on Ways and Means? Why have not you that privilege? Why do not you assert your rights, and when they attempt to bring in a rule to cut you off from your rights in passing important legislation, why do not you rise up and say you will not have any such rule? Are you going to be as meek as Moses all your life and bow to this little bunch of autocrats on the Rules Committee? [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit to go unchallenged some statements made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] with reference to water that has already passed over the wheel, to wit, the tariff bill. The gentleman from Tennessee complains that that bill was passed under a special rule that did not permit the minority to take up the remainder of this year in proposing amendments to that bill. He complains that the rule was drastic and that it should not have been agreed to and that no such rule should ever be agreed to again in a future Congress or at any other time. It so happens that it has not been very long since the gentleman from Tennessee himself brought a rule into this House for the consideration of a revenue measure, a measure which covered 101 pages, and the rule was so much more drastic than the rule under which the Fordney bill was considered that I am tempted to read some of its provisions to you.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. With pleasure.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman think it is conducive to sound conclusions to justify one infamy by another?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Hardly, and yet the gentleman from Kansas was just as anxious to get the Fordney bill through the House in the year 1921 as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] was to get the Kitchin bill through in 1916. It was a matter of getting the legislation through by those who were responsible for the enactment of it and to prevent its obstruction and mutilation by those who were opposed to it.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman mean that an amendment by the minority means mutilation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Very often.

Mr. COCKRAN. So that amendments then should be excluded?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But to the point that I have in mind. The resolution under which the Kitchin bill was considered and passed is as follows:

House resolution 291 (H. Rept. 923).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 16763; that the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with; that general debate shall continue on the bill until not later than Friday next at 6 o'clock p. m., the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and one-half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]; that while the bill is under consideration the House shall meet at 11 o'clock a. m.; that the bill shall be the order for all legislative days except Calendar Wednesday; that at the expiration of general debate the bill shall be read in full by the Clerk without interruption; that upon conclusion of the reading of the bill amendments may be offered to any paragraph of the bill and considered and disposed of under the 5-minute rule until Monday next at 5 o'clock p. m., when all pending amendments shall, without further debate, be voted on.

After all pending amendments shall be disposed of the committee shall rise and report to the House the bill and all amendments that shall have been recommended by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and amendments to its final passage; and the House shall immediately proceed to vote on amendments, engrossment, third reading, and final passage of the bill without intervening motions, except one motion to recommit.

I want now to show the effect of the rule and to show how it operated. When the bill was read for amendment, Mr. KITCHIN rose and the following occurred:

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, since we have had so many political speeches, it has deprived many Members who have important amendments, or amendments which they consider important, and perhaps they are kept from offering them. It will be impossible for us to debate all these amendments, and I believe that they should be placed before the House and be voted upon. I do not know as we can ask unanimous consent in the Committee of the Whole, but I will make this suggestion, and I hope it will be agreed to, that from now on until the committee has to rise, under the rule, all gentlemen who have amendments may send them up to the desk, have them read, and voted on as soon as possible.

Mr. FORDNEY. Without debate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Without debate, because one amendment and debate would take up all the time.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. When do we vote?

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee will rise at 5 o'clock.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That will give us 12 minutes to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina requests that those having amendments may offer them at this time and have them voted upon without debate.

Mr. BENNET. Reserving the right to object, this will be a useless mechanical performance. If we can not have time to consider an important bill like this, this automatic device for considering amendments is a waste of time, and I object.

Twelve minutes for the consideration of amendments to a bill containing 101 pages! That was provided for in the rule brought in by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who a moment ago bemoaned the fact that we had a bill under consideration for amendment for a period of seven days. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Is it then the idea of the gentleman that that condition should be made worse?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We have improved upon it, from 12 minutes to 7 days.

Mr. COCKRAN. But with no amendments.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, no. Not one.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I thought we were here for the consideration of the rule now at the desk. I am interested in that.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, the precedent may not justify the rule for the Fordney bill, but the precedent created by the man who now criticizes goes to the good faith of the criticism, does it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. At least that far. Having completely answered all of the arguments against the rule now pending, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF DAMAGES FOR INFRINGEMENT OF RADIO PATENTS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7111) authorizing the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy jointly to make settlement of damages and compensation due by the United States for infringement of radio patents connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is this bill one of those provided for in the rule which we just passed?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to one hour, 30 minutes of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] and 30 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS]. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the measure that is going to be debated?

Mr. KAHN. It is known as the radio bill, authorizing the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy to make settlement of damages and compensation due by the United States for infringement of radio patents.

Mr. WALSH. How does the Committee on Military Affairs get jurisdiction of that bill?

Mr. KAHN. By the Speaker referring it to that committee. The Committee on Military Affairs did not take jurisdiction of the bill. The bill was sent to the committee by the Speaker, and it came to the Speaker signed by three Cabinet officers of this Government—the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the Attorney General.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Under the special rule providing for the consideration of this measure is debate limited to the bill?

The SPEAKER. No; it is not. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Would it be out of order to ask to have the rule read?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent; it has been already adopted.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Long ago? I did not recall it this morning.

The SPEAKER. The rule simply provides that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs may move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California that the time be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7111, with Mr. SCOTT of Michigan in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7111, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7111) authorizing the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy jointly to make settlement of damages and compensation due by the United States for infringement of radio patents connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. WALSH. The bill ought to be reported.

Mr. KAHN. All right.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy, acting jointly, are hereby authorized to adjust, pay, and discharge on a fair and equitable basis any and all just and meritorious claims against the United States for or on account of the use or manufacture by or for the United States of any patented invention relating to radio communication in cases in which such patented invention was used without agreement with the owner as to compensation therefor; such settlement of claims to cover both past (whether prior to, during, or after the war) and future use where practicable in all cases, and to be based on the determination by such agency as the said Secretaries and Attorney General have designated or established or may designate or establish, of all questions of infringement, validity of patents, and value of such inventions: Provided, That this provision shall not be so construed as to deprive owners of patents who shall not accept settlement under this act of any rights of action conferred by the acts for the protection of the owners of patents approved June 25, 1910, and July 1, 1918, respectively; and for the payment of such claims the sum of 2,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided further, That no payment shall be made under the authority herein conferred to any person or persons entitled to recover unless such person or persons shall within a period of six months from the date of the approval of this act accept in writing the amount awarded jointly by the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs received this bill from the Speaker of the House, who had received it from the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Attorney General. It developed at the hearing before the committee—

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman gets into his argument, will he yield for one question?

Mr. KAHN. I want to state the purpose of the bill, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask one question, which, it seems to me is very pertinent at this point. That is, the bill says "For the payment of such claims the sum of $2,500,000"—

Mr. KAHN. Of course, when I discuss the bill I will explain that. It is a misprint. The dollar mark is left out.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I did not want to know about the dollar sign. But I wanted to ask how this appropriation—

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will allow me to explain, I will tell the committee just how that was arrived at.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But the gentleman does not get my question.

Mr. KAHN. There were claims put in approximating $30,000,000. When the war broke out the Military Establishment and the Naval Establishment took possession of various pieces of apparatus used in radiotelegraph work.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair is only able to count 95 Members on the floor.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson	Elston	Langley	Rosenberg

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCORR of Michigan, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 217 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he reported the list of absentees, to be entered in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, when this bill came to the Committee on Military Affairs three Secretaries of the Government joined in the recommendation that it be passed by Congress and asked for an early hearing. The Committee on Military Affairs had before them the principals of the interdepartmental radio board, which had been working for three years on this matter. When the war broke out the Government found it necessary to seize a great many patented devices which were in use in the radio service. The owners of these devices were told that the Government needed them for war purposes and asked them to surrender these devices to the Government in the hope that eventually the Government would pay them for what they had taken. The testimony before the committee shows that the sum of $14,800,000 was asked on the part of some claimants, and that there were as many additional claims put in, but for which no sum was stated, which claims would amount to as much as that and probably a little more.

It was believed that about $30,000,000 was involved in all these claims. The interdepartmental board on these matters sent for the interested parties and took testimony which ran along over a protracted period. They finally agreed with the claimants that if the money were promptly allowed by Congress the claimants would be willing to settle for a total of $2,500,000. There are two claims that are not represented in this matter. One of them is the so-called De Forest claim, approximating $2,000,000, who want to take their claim into the Court of Claims and determine whether they have any claim or not; and there is also an individual company that has a claim of $150,000. So that this bill covers all the other claims. There were some 2,500 patents that were, in one way or another, involved in this whole question. But finally the interdepartmental board resolved the matter down so that the number of patents upon which various amounts were asked were something like 149. Then they sifted that down again to something like 28, with the understanding that if the settlements were paid on those the owners of all the other patents would also give a receipt in full to the Government. So that one company, I think, had four claims for which allowance was made, but they had about 40 other claims for which they were asking payment. They were willing to lump those 40 claims in with the amount that was being paid for the four.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman remember the name of the claimant that had a claim for $150,000?

Mr. KAHN. I do not recall what company that was. It was rather a small company, and when the witness was before our committee he could not recall the name of the claimant.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman know whether or not a Pittsburgh firm had a claim of any kind?

Mr. KAHN. I think you will find that in the report.

Mr. RICKETTS. I can not find it.

Mr. KAHN. There are 24 claimants named.

Mr. RICKETTS. The report does not name any claimant, in fact.

Mr. KAHN. I mean the hearings.

Mr. NORTON. I would like to ask the gentleman how many patents we acquire under this?

Mr. KAHN. We do not acquire any patents.

Mr. NORTON. It was for the use of the patents—simply for the license?

Mr. KAHN. Some of the companies have agreed to give the Government a grant to use the patents from now on.

Mr. NORTON. Perpetual licenses?

Mr. KAHN. Practically; some of them.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it intended that any of this appropriation shall go to those companies from which the Government leased their systems during the war?

Mr. KAHN. The money is to go to those people who furnished the actual patents or the devices which were manufactured under patents.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I know, but is it not the fact that the Government has already paid all the radio companies from whom they purchased their systems and all from whom they leased their systems, either the purchase value or for the lease of the property?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know whether the Government has, but that was not involved in this question.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Now, one further question. Why does this bill propose to cover the settlement of claims prior to and subsequent to the war as well as during the war?

Mr. KAHN. Well, I presume the Government had been using some of this patented apparatus before the war, and, of course, would be subject to a suit for having infringed those patents. I presume the intention was to include any prior claims in this bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; but the title of your bill states that it is for infringement of radio patents connected with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. KAHN. Well, it is probably a little broader than that; but that arose, as I stated, from the fact that the Government probably had been infringing some of these patents before we got into the war. And this will take care of them all.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. One further question. I notice it provides for or on account of the use or manufactured by or for the United States. Now, when it says "manufactured for the United States" does not that cause the Government to underwrite the liability of any private manufacturing concern which may have manufactured anything that was sold to the Government?

Mr. KAHN. Not altogether so. If the company lived up to its contract with the Government and delivered the devices, that was all there was to it. If they could not deliver the devices, I assume the Government had a good bond from the manufacturer to the effect that he would deliver according to his contract or pay a penalty.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I know; but the Government has paid these private manufacturing concerns for all apparatus that was purchased from them, and if they infringed upon somebody else's patent why should the Government be responsible?

Mr. KAHN. The letter of the Secretaries who sent this down to the Congress says at the very beginning:

Prior to the war with Germany the Government, principally the War and Navy Departments, found it necessary, because the validity of many patents relating to wireless telegraphy had not been judicially determined, to use wireless apparatus of various kinds without strict regard to the rights claimed by patentees.

And so on. That explains the reason for that. We had been using these very devices. We did not know who the patentee was or what rights he had, and that was all to be thrashed out. Now, the departments of the Government think that those claims should also be included with the claims that grew directly out of the war.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As I understand this, you propose to authorize these three Secretaries to settle with certain persons who claim to own patents which were used by the Government. Suppose these three Secretaries settle with Mr. A, who claims to be the owner of a patent, and then it transpires through court proceedings that somebody else, in fact, owned that patent; what is the situation then?

Mr. KAHN. The interdepartmental board has gone into that very fully.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Their decision is not above the decision of a court as to who actually owned the patent.

Mr. KAHN. I believe we have gone into these things so fully and so thoroughly—that was the information the committee received—that that question was not raised.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. My belief is they do not know anything about it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, there are a great many of these radio patents.

Mr. KAHN. Twenty-five hundred of them.

Mr. MANN. And a great conflict between different patents as to what is legally covered?

Mr. KAHN. Quite a number.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the Government, through this agency, goes ahead and settles with one man, and the department or the Secretary finds that a certain patent covered certain things, and settles with the owner of that patent, and pays the money. Of course, that is not binding on the man who claims to have a conflicting patent. That is not binding on anybody else.

Mr. KAHN. No; but I understand that these gentlemen went into all that.

Mr. MANN. They can not determine legally that question. Patent decisions are the finest-haired court decisions that our courts render. It depends largely upon the immediate testimony. Now, supposing that the Government having settled with one man claiming that the patent covers a certain thing, the other claimant files a proceeding in the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims finds that he is the owner of a patent covering this particular device. We shall have to pay again, will we not?

Mr. KAHN. I suppose that if under such circumstances the Government has paid, and it was found subsequently that the man who was paid was not the owner, then the Government would have to pay again. But I understand that these questions were boiled down so that a case of that kind can not happen.

Mr. MANN. I am not a patent lawyer, and I do not know whether there is one here.

Mr. KAHN. You know in this country they say when you get a patent you simply get an invitation to a lawsuit.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and the only place where that law suit can be determined is in a court of law or a chancery court. It can not be determined by a board appointed by three Secretaries, with or without our authority.

Now, different patent suits have been tried in this country, and in some of the courts they have been sustained and in some other courts they have not been sustained—the same patents—until the matter has reached the Supreme Court of the United States, where distinguished judges have differed as to the validity of title. How are we to fix it so that three clerks up here—not even secretaries, but three clerks—can determine it? I see they say they have appointed very eminent clerks. They may be experts. I did not know that they had an expert patent man in the Attorney General's office, and I did not know that they had an expert patent lawyer in the War Department or in the Navy Department. But suppose they have. Those gentlemen decide a thing according to their minds, but they do not determine the thing as a court would determine it, nor do they determine anything except on the evidence which they have. And after one man gets paid he has no interest in preventing another man from getting paid.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I understand there are 2,500 of these claims.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; 2,500 patents. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-one minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I have nine minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman has nine minutes more.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will answer one question and then I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I observe that this bill proposes to provide a settlement for violation of patents prior to the necessity of which arose out of the war.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. I have already explained that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Very well. Does the gentleman know whether there was any authority of law under which these departments prior to the war did violate patents? With reference to radio communication during the war, of course, they did.

Mr. KAHN. The matter has been much involved. Before 1910 the Government could always violate any patent and the patentee had to take his chances in getting paid. In 1910 Congress passed a law which would give the patentee certain rights. That law was extended still further in 1918 while we were in the war. But the War Department has been violating patents, I presume, right along.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is not the whole thing predicated on the assumption that what the Government did was without authority of law?

Mr. KAHN. I think so. Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On July 21, 1921:

H. R. 6573. An act to further reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 5756. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916; and to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system in the Philippine Islands," approved March 2, 1903.

On July 25, 1921:

H. J. Res. 32. Joint resolution to change the name of the Grand River in Colorado and Utah to the Colorado River.

SETTLEMENT OF DAMAGES FOR INFRINGEMENT OF RADIO PATENTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, on June 23 I made a speech in open session of this House wherein I submitted some observations relative to the policies of the Federal Reserve Board enforced by it last year and the influence the members of the board, particularly Gov. Harding, had over the Banking and Currency Committees of the House and Senate.

On June 27 Mr. Platt, vice governor of the board, wrote me a letter calling me to account for making this speech, saying, among other things, that the speech I delivered was "utterly unworthy of me," and that I should "apologize to Gov. Harding." The vice governor did not stop at this, which I regard as insolent and against the rules of good breeding, but he went further in his illegal and caustic criticisms and by implication, if not in express terms, threatened that I would pay a penalty of some character for making this speech.

Now, in order that the committee may understand my cause of complaint, it will be necessary for me to read Mr. Platt's letter. He says:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, June 27, 1921.

HON. CHARLES H. BRAND,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BRAND: As a former colleague of yours in the Banking and Currency Committee, I must say that I think your speech on June 23 with regard to the farm loan bill amendment and especially your attack on the Federal Reserve Board and on Gov. Harding were utterly unworthy of you. You know as well as I do that the Federal Reserve Board even if it had so desired could not have been responsible for a world-wide slump in prices. Every thinking man knew that prices during the war and especially during the period following the war were too high and must come down. Every student of history knows that a similar slump of prices and a similar period of readjustment has taken place after every war since history began.

Furthermore, I notice with some concern for your political future that you are decidedly at odds with the accredited leader of the Democratic Party, former Gov. James M. Cox, of Ohio. Gov. Cox said in a signed editorial in his newspaper (copied in the Washington Post to-day) that the failure of the United States to ratify the peace treaty was the chief cause of present economic conditions.

"We are gathering the harvest of our own sowing," says he, and adds, "except for the operation of the Federal reserve bank system we would be in the midst of the worst panic the world has known."

Now, I don't mean to indorse all that Gov. Cox says by any means. The slump, as I have said above, is world wide and was inevitable, treaty or no treaty, but it is certainly true, as every economist recognizes, that the Federal reserve system has saved us from a crash, which would have been as bad as, and probably worse than, the historic panics of 1837, 1857, 1873, or 1893. Without the sustaining help of the Federal reserve system three-quarters of the banks in the country would have suspended and failure and disaster would have been on every hand. What are the actual facts? We have gone through a very serious world-wide crisis and seem to be beginning to recover from its effects—yet the number of failures has not at any time been much greater than normal. A good many small State banks have gone down in some sections of the country, and some national banks, but the failures in North Dakota were due largely to other causes than the slump in prices, and speculation in land or in oil or in so-called "blue sky" stocks has been at the bottom of many of the bank failures in other States.

Our country is in vastly better condition than most South American countries, and products of those countries, like rubber and sugar, have fallen much more than cotton has fallen from the peak. It may interest you to know that several countries are seeking to establish a Federal reserve system similar to ours and are asking our advice as to how to do it. Yet you and TOM HEFLIN and some others are persisting in declaring the Federal reserve system and the Federal Reserve Board, and particularly Gov. Harding, responsible for all our ills.

I want to tell you that you are going to have these things quoted against you in time if you keep them up. What would you gain if you should succeed in forcing Gov. Harding out of the Federal Reserve Board? Would the South thank you for it? Could President Harding find a better man? Would the South thank you for the apparent suggestion of assassination in your speech? You will find a reaction from all this talk in the not very distant future—before the next primaries come on at any rate.

Gov. Harding is the hardest working member of the Federal Reserve Board, the last man to leave every afternoon, and the one man whom we have never yet been able to persuade to take any real vacation. He has the best interests of the South and of the country very much at heart, as I believe you really know. You men from the South ought to be defending him instead of trying to force him out of the board. You owe him an apology.

In all friendship, yours, very sincerely,

EDMUND PLATT.

Perhaps I am taking your speech rather too seriously. Some members of the committee, whom I saw at or just after lunch to-day, have told me that you did not deliver all of it, but anyway you ought not to give circulation to ideas that may do harm and can't do any good. Your country banks in Georgia, according to our information, charge the farmer what amounts to an average of 10½ per cent on their agricultural notes. The Federal reserve rate is 6 per cent. Why not get after the real culprits? Georgia is one of the old original Thirteen States, and it ought to have eastern rates of interest to the farmers, as well as to merchants.

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave at this time to revise and extend my remarks. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in reading all the correspondence that I have here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Does the gentleman propose to desist from further addressing the House, so that we can discuss this pending bill, wherein they are attempting to take from the Treasury two or three million dollars? We would like to have all the time possible to devote to the discussion of this bill.

Mr. BRAND. No; I propose to occupy the time allotted to me. Doing so will not delay defeating this bill.

I answered this letter, disclaiming any personal accusations against either Mr. Platt or Gov. Harding. My reply to his letter did not satisfy me, and I wrote him another letter to which he replied, and while still disclaiming to some extent it did not withdraw the sting that was in his original letter. You will notice that among other things in that letter, referring to the bankers of Georgia, he says:

Your country banks in Georgia, according to our information, charge the farmers what amounts to an average of 10½ per cent on their agricultural notes. The Federal reserve rate is 6 per cent. Why not get after the real culprits?

Then the following correspondence passed between us:

Hon. EDMUND PLATT,
Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C.

JUNE 28, 1921.

DEAR MR. PLATT: Your letter of June 27 received this morning. Out of personal respect and regard for both you and Gov. Harding, I answer the same promptly.

In the first place, I don't consider that you have the right to lecture me in regard to my speech delivered last Thursday on the floor of the House of Representatives, because I said nothing about you personally and nothing about Gov. Harding personally. On the contrary, I was cautious not to do so. My purpose was not to make any personal references whatever to any member of the board, much less to Gov. Harding and yourself. You are the only two members of the board whom I personally know. If you will carefully read the speech you will see my references were not personal, as above indicated, but they were general in their terms. For instance, I referred frequently to the "board" or the "Federal Reserve Board," to the "policies of the board," and to the "policies adopted by the board." The whole speech will show that what I was condemning was the policy adopted by the Federal Reserve Board last year. In one reference to my speech, on page 2967, referring to the policies adopted by the board last year, I made a qualification, as follows: "However honest the board may have been in promulgating this," and on page 2968, at the bottom of the first column, I made the distinct statement that I did not charge anybody with corruption.

In the reference to what Secretary Houston and Gov. Harding are said to have replied to the farmers' representation last fall, I did not charge that they made this statement, but did say according to press reports it was made. Besides, I referred to Gov. Harding as speaking for the Federal Reserve Board.

In the second column on page 2968 I tried to make myself clear in regard to the Dickens quotation by using this language: "Of course, I do not mean to invite such disaster to any human being or to make this reference in any sense personal to anyone." This statement was made on the floor during the deliverance of my speech. I was sincere in making it. I thought it was advisable to do so, and I am particularly gratified to know I had sense and discretion enough to do so, in the light of your criticism.

In reply to a question which carried a charge against Gov. Harding, made by Mr. KING, of Illinois, I distinctly stated that I did not in any sense intend to reflect upon him personally.

A careful and impartial reading of this speech will show that I was dealing in general with organized bodies, including the Banking and Currency Committees of the House and Senate, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Republican Party. These references express my honest conviction, whether it meets with the board's approval or not, and whether your criticism is just or not. The people of my district are in a terrible condition. This includes both the white and colored people, particularly the tenant class. I do not mean to say, however, that it does not also include the people who are landowners. Many people are without homes and without provisions to feed their families. They tried to make this year's crop while hungry and half clothed. Many farmers have been forced into bankruptcy. The accumulations of a lifetime have been swept away and destroyed on account of the sudden slump in the price of cotton, running it down from 45 cents to 10 cents a pound. This caused thousands and thousands of dollars to be lost by many of my own constituents. I honestly believe that this great reduction in the price of cotton has destroyed the values of at least 90 per cent of the property owners of my district. The future is ominous and dark, and I can see in it but little ray of hope for recovery in the future, and yet up to date not a single thing has been done for the southern people. The western farmers have been taken care of not only by the emergency tariff bill but by the efforts of Secretary Mellon, and, as I understand, arrangements made with your board whereby $50,000,000 has been made available for the cattle growers of the West. The southern cotton grower has not been given the consideration to which he is entitled, and it is useless to dispute this fact.

The banks in my section of the State are not guilty of the charges as set forth in your postscript. So far as my knowledge goes the banks in my section are not charging usurious rates. They are not violating the usury laws of Georgia. I do not know of a single bank who charges the agricultural people over 8 per cent per annum, this being the lawful rate in Georgia. If they have done so, it does not meet with my approval. For your information I call your attention to the fact that you doubtless do not know that there are four banks within 30 miles of each other in Gwinnett County, near Lawrenceville, Ga., which was the county of my residence from maturity until about 18 years ago. You and Gov. Harding can not learn anything about the condition of the people of the country by staying here in Washington or by visiting the principal cities of the West and South.

The Federal Reserve Board is a great system. Gov. Harding deserves the unstinted gratitude of the United States and the world, so far as this is concerned, for the successful management of this board during the World War, but to my dying day I will believe that the policies of the board entered upon and promulgated last year, and the effect thereof, is the prime cause of the distressed and impoverished condition of the people of my section of Georgia. It gives me great concern and makes my heart bleed to think of their condition and hear their appeals, as I do, when I am at home and through their letters while here in Washington, particularly when nothing has been done for them in the past, and but little hope of having anything done for them in the future.

In conclusion, I may say my speech taken as a whole, and particularly in the light of the excerpts to which I have called your attention in this letter, shows that I did not intend in any sense to be personal against any member of the board, particularly Gov. Harding. As you doubtless know, this is the first time since I have been a Member of Congress when upon the floor of the House of Representatives I have made any public utterances or charges against the Republican Party, the Federal Reserve Board, or any organized committee of either branch of Congress, and yet criticism of the Federal Reserve Board and its policies has been freely indulged in and constantly so by Senators of the United States not only in the Senate but in the press and other public gatherings for months and months past. Not only is this true in regard to the Senators but it is likewise true in regard to many public men throughout the country and much of the press of the Nation.

What I have written, Mr. Platt, is in all kindness and with personal esteem and respect for both you and Gov. Harding.

Sincerely, yours,

(Signed) C. H. BRAND.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, June 29, 1921.

Hon. CHARLES H. BRAND,
House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE BRAND: I want to thank you for your frank letter of the 28th. I felt sure you could not have intended any personal reflection on Gov. Harding, but I knew how some people who had read the speech were construing it, and I decided to write the letter without consulting the governor, though I afterwards told him I had written it. KING and some others, of course, are always trying to egg somebody on in condemnation of Gov. Harding or of the board.

Of course, I haven't any right, except that of old friendship, to lecture you in regard to any speech you may deliver, but you know I have always been rather frank and outspoken, and while of course criticisms of the board or its policies are legitimate I think you will admit that they are certainly arguable. I sympathize fully with the plight of the cotton growers, as well as with that of other farmers and with manufacturers who are in the same position, but I believe also that it might have been much worse than it is. If my memory is correct, cotton in previous times of business and financial crises has several times gone as low as 5 cents. Consider what might have happened last fall if confidence in the ability of the Federal reserve system had been impaired. Now, as you know, the reserves of the system were in May—several months before the normal time of greatest pressure—right on the edge of the legal requirements. They might have gone below, and we might have suspended reserve requirements, but if that had occurred as early as May or June, before the peak of the harvest requirements, and with the certainty that they must still go lower in the fall—unless the banks had quit loaning right when farmers most needed loans—confidence would have been impaired and the inevitable break of prices already begun in Japan in the silk panic, which had spread to wool and some other products, would have been much more severe and much more drastic than it was.

All over the world prices were on an inflated basis, some of them higher than war prices. No power on earth could have kept them up. In our own country the break would have come earlier if it had not been for the abnormal demand for our products abroad, stimulated by Government loans and subsidies—some of the loans those of our own Treasury, but most of them loans and subsidies of the European Governments which were often buying directly from us. That, of course, couldn't keep on. Bankruptcy was too close to most of them, and our own burden of debt was appalling.

When the break in the silk market began in Japan it found our Government no longer loaning to Europe for the purchase of our goods, and it found European Governments beginning to curtail and trying to put their people somewhat on their feet. Synchronizing with all this was the so-called "buyers' strike" in our own country against high prices. The result was a tremendous withdrawal of demand in the face of large crops produced at high costs. Nothing that the Federal Reserve Board or system could have done, in my opinion, could have stopped the decline. Had reserve rates been lowered, or left as low as they were during the war, that would simply have got the people, especially those who were producing primary products like cotton on borrowed money, in deeper and would have made their losses worse.

The only thing that the Federal Reserve Board can be fairly criticized for was for not raising its rates more promptly after the armistice. I am not sure that the speculation of the fall of 1919 and the spring of 1920 would have been wholly stopped by such action, but it would have been curtailed and the 1920 cotton and other crops would have been made with less cost. It was speculation that put cotton up above 40 cents and wheat to the neighborhood of $3. Very little of either was ever sold at those prices, and they simply served to raise false hopes and to make people who really knew that a drop in prices must come feel that it wasn't coming yet, and that they were safe in going ahead blindly no matter what they had to borrow.

I am thoroughly convinced that the Federal reserve system can't operate properly or in accordance with the ideas of its proponents if there is a big profit in rediscounting. In your own State, with the banks loaning at 8 per cent and borrowing from the reserve bank at 6 per cent, there is still too much temptation to loan for the sake of the 2 per cent profit, though as the country banks are now all loaded with back loans I don't think the temptation can now be said to be operative.

Just a word as to the rate at the country banks in Georgia. Isn't it true that those banks often charge the farmer 16 per cent? Here's their game, as I have heard it stated by several people who are in a position to know: A farmer comes in to borrow $1,000. The bank says, "All right; you can have it at 8 per cent." Then the farmer signs his note for six months and the bank discounts it, giving him credit for $1,000, less $80, or $920. Now, they call that 8 per cent, but it really is 16 per cent. Such outrageous extortion ought to be stopped anyway, and it seems to me that 8 per cent is too high for an old Eastern State, one of the original Thirteen States, like Georgia. Federal reserve rates have nothing to do with the rates the farmers pay. When the reserve rates were 4 and 5 per cent the country banks got their 8 and 16 per cent just the same.

One trouble is that most of the country banks are too small. They haven't enough loaning power, or capital, and too many of them can't live without exorbitant interest charges, or the so-called "exchange" charge on the payment of their own checks. What is needed is a series of consolidations to strengthen the banks, and many of the smaller ones ought to be branches of strong institutions instead of independent banks. You have branch banking in Georgia, and it ought to be expanded and strengthened as has been done in California. I see no reason why, with such cities as Atlanta and Savannah, and ocean transportation for your splendid peaches and your cotton, you should not have as strong a banking system as California has, with branch banks in the smaller towns, backed by the capital of the large banks in the cities.

Yours, very truly,

EDMUND PLATT.

JUNE 30, 1921.

Hon. EDMUND PLATT,
Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PLATT: After replying to your letter of June 27, I again carefully reread the same. There is one paragraph in it that I do not understand, which is as follows:

"I want to tell you that you are going to have these things quoted against you in time if you keep them up. What would you gain if you should succeed in forcing Gov. Harding out of the Federal Reserve Board? Would the South thank you for it? Could President Harding find a better man? Would the South thank you for the apparent suggestion of assassination in your speech? You will find a reaction from all this talk in the not very distant future—before the next primaries come, at any rate."

I do not know what you mean by the use of this language, particularly the first and the last sentences of this excerpt.

First, I would like to know what you have in mind when you say I am going to have these things quoted against me in time if I keep them up. Do you mean by my Democratic constituents or by some Republican who may run against me, or by the board?

Referring to the last sentence wherein you say I will find a reaction from this talk in the not very distant future, I would like to know what you mean by this statement. It contains a veiled threat which I can not solve. Do you mean that the board is going to "start something" or you or Gov. Harding for the board, and if so, when and how? Do you mean that the board, or you, or Gov. Harding is going to try to get out some sort of opposition to me, either from Democratic or Republican sources, and that it is your intention to begin some sort of war on me in the not very distant future? In short, when you wrote this excerpt from your letter did you have in mind that some one was going to attack me? If so, who is going to do it, and how?

Mr. Platt, you are a very intelligent man, very cautious and careful, not only in your personal conversation but more so in writing, and after reflection, I therefore take it that you seem to have singled me out and some sort of revenge is to be heaped upon me. Entertaining this view, or being in doubt and uncertainty about it, I have concluded that I owe it to myself to write you this additional letter with the request which I respectfully make that you advise me what you had in mind when you wrote it.

I am sending this letter by special delivery, hoping that you may do me the kindness to promptly reply to the same.

I beg to remain, with regards,

Very truly, yours,

C. H. BRAND.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, July 12, 1921.

Hon. CHARLES H. BRAND,
House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE BRAND: I was very much surprised to find yours of the 30th awaiting me this morning on my return from a week in Connecticut—surprised because of the interpretation put upon words that were about what one Congressman might say to another in argument, and were certainly not intended to do more than show that with a change in sentiment, which it seems to me is already beginning to take place, what you had said might be used by an opponent against you. There was surely no implication that anything would or could be "started" by me or any member of the board. In fact, if any opponent of yours were to come to me—I can't imagine how any such person would think of doing so—my impulse would be to defend you as a friend and former colleague, and to say that while we had had our differences of opinion we had argued them out ourselves, and to maintain that certain interruptions in your speech had given it a twist that you did not intend.

To go a little further into the general subject between ourselves—where did the attacks on Gov. Harding and the board originate? Weren't they originally Republican propaganda, put out during the election campaign last fall? Didn't a good part of their circulation come from the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, the editor of which is a Republican? I happen to know that for a little while some of this propaganda was found in Republican publicity items, but there were some prominent Republicans who considered it unfair and unwise and did what they could to stop it. Whether as a result of their efforts or not northern newspapers made very little use of these criticisms, but through the Manufacturers' Record they continued to obtain wide circulation in the South. It was certainly a queer situation, that what was originally Republican propaganda had most of its influence among Democrats, or at least in Democratic States. But already a number of publications have changed their tone and are giving the Federal reserve system credit for preventing a panic, which would have been far worse in its results than anything that has taken place, and it seems to me clear that propaganda of such origin isn't going to be always popular in the South.

The board, I may add, hardly ever meets without discussing the possibility of doing something further to relieve conditions in the cotton-growing sections. It doesn't seem, however, as if much could be done through member or nonmember banks that are already so over-loaded that they don't feel that they can go further. The Federal reserve banks are strong—particularly strong as a whole—but can not make loans except through member banks. We have a regional and not a central reserve banking system, and if the reserve bank of Atlanta, for instance, is not doing all it can, that is not the fault of the board, for the directors of the bank, not the board, decide what loans to make. From all I can see the reserve bank of Atlanta is doing what it can, but it can't go further than its member banks are willing to go.

Perhaps the latest war finance proposition announced in this morning's paper will give the help needed. I don't know how far it is wise to advise farmers to continue to hold cotton. Nobody can tell what will happen in Europe, and the price depends largely on foreign selling; but it looks to me, with the British coal strike over, as if stability ought gradually to return and with it an increased demand for cotton. When the political risk of socialist upheavals, etc., is lessened, the Edge corporations will begin to function on a larger scale, and that will help. One of them is already doing very well.

With best regards,

EDMUND PLATT.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BRAND. Yes; although I have very little time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As the gentleman knows, the Constitution says that a Member of Congress can not be questioned in any other place. Does that mean that a citizen can not criticize a Member of Congress?

Mr. BRAND. Of course not. I am opposing limitations upon free speech. I am contending for unhampered privilege of free speech. However, there is a distinction between criticism and insult; there is a distinction between criticism and intimidation; there is a distinction between criticism and threats, of which a Government officer, particularly one who has taken an oath to support the Constitution, should not be unmindful.

The difference between me and the vice governor amounts to nothing so far as other Members are concerned, because they are not interested in the personal phase of the controversy. His letter, however, presents a question in which every Member of the House is directly interested. It involves the privileges of every Member of the American Congress now and for all time to come. It involves the constitutional privileges of free speech guaranteed to Members of Congress by the Constitution of the United States.

The article and provisions to which I refer declares:

They (the Senators and Representatives) shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House, they (the Senators and Representatives) shall not be questioned in any other place.

If this provision of the Constitution means what it says, then the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board has not only violated this provision of the Constitution but he also broke faith with the oath he took when as a Member of Congress he swore to support the Constitution of the United States and to bear true faith and allegiance thereto. My charge is he is guilty of a grave infraction of the Constitution of the United States, which he, with uplifted hand, has solemnly sworn he would support. He did so either through ignorance or, if with knowledge, for want of respect of the Constitution and in utter disregard of the sacredness of his oath.

This provision of the Constitution has been considered and reviewed not only by this House in cases which came within its jurisdiction but also by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, in construing this provision, the court, in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, says:

We may perhaps find some aid in ascertaining the meaning of this provision if we can find out its source, and, fortunately, in this there is no difficulty. For while the framers of the Constitution did not adopt the lex et consuetudo of the English Parliament as a whole, they did incorporate such parts of it, and with it such privileges of Parliament as they thought proper to be applied to the two Houses of Congress. The freedom from arrest and freedom of speech in the two Houses of Parliament were long subjects of contest between the Tudor and Stuart Kings and the House of Commons. When, however, the revolution of 1688 expelled the last of the Stuarts and introduced a new dynasty, many of these questions were settled by a bill of rights, formally declared by the Parliament and assented to by the Crown. One of these declarations is that the freedom of speech and debates and proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament.

In Stockdale against Hansard, Lord Denman, speaking on this subject, says the privileges of having their debates unquestioned, though denied when the members began to speak their minds freely in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and punished in its exercise both by that princess and her two successors, was soon clearly perceived to be indispensable and universally acknowledged. By consequence whatever is done within the walls of either assembly must pass without question in any other place. For speeches made in Parliament by a member to the prejudice of any other person, or hazardous to the public peace, that member enjoys complete impunity. This case is reported in 103 United States, page 168.

In the case of Williamson against the United States, 207 United States, page 425, in discussing this provision of the Constitution the late Chief Justice White, delivering the opinion, among other things said:

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Congress.

In the case of Lovell H. Rousseau for contempt of the House, in 1866, cited in Second Hinds' Precedents, section 1655, the House still recognized that the principles announced in this provision of the Constitution, namely, that Members of the House can not be questioned for any speech in any other place, were still in force. The committee in discussing the question announced the rule that parliamentary assemblies were founded on the theory of the inviolability of the person of the representative.

In Third Hinds' Precedents, section 2684, this case is cited: On August 12, 1848, Mr. George Fries, of Ohio, by leave presented a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs which was read to the House.

This communication was in response to a speech in which Mr. Thomas L. Clingman, of North Carolina, had denounced the Indian Bureau as thoroughly corrupt. The letter of the commissioner was addressed "To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States," and besides entering into a defense of the Indian Bureau charged the Member of the House making the charges with improper conduct in his representative capacity.

A motion was made by Mr. John A. Rockwell, of Connecticut, that the communication, being disrespectful in its language, be not received.

Considerable discussion arose, it being urged that the letter invaded the privileges of the House, a Member being privileged as to his remarks on the floor from being questioned in any other place.

Whereupon Mr. Fries withdrew the communication.

Judge Storey, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

The next great and vital privilege is the freedom of speech and debate, without which all other privileges would be comparatively unimportant or ineffectual. This privilege is derived from the practice of the British Parliament, and was in full exercise in our colonial legislation, and now belongs to the legislation of every State in the Union as a matter of constitutional right.

In the journal of the Constitutional Convention, volume 2, kept by James Madison, it is recorded that Mr. Pinckney submitted to the House the following proposition:

Each House shall be the judge of its own privileges, and shall have authority to punish by imprisonment every person violating the same or who in the place where the Legislature may be sitting and during the time of its session shall threaten any of its Members for anything said or done in the House.

In the Columbia Law Review, 1910, volume 10, there appears an able paper entitled "Absolute immunity in defamation," by Van Vechten Veeder, which has been approvingly referred to by one of the writers on the Constitution:

Freedom of speech is inherent in the idea of a deliberative assembly. Absolute immunity is confined to Members of Congress and of the State legislatures. Speech is the element which gives life and power of action to such a body, as air does to the natural body. And the free and fearless discussion of every plan and purpose, which is essential to wise legislation, would be impossible if members were subjected to the restraints imposed by law with respect to private reputation. The essential nature of such immunity is shown by the fact that it has followed parliamentary government in its progress throughout the world.

In discussing the resolutions introduced in Congress involving this provision of the Constitution Mr. Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, among other things makes this statement:

The freedom of debate, the dearest privilege of freedom, was involved.

Adding—

If the time should ever come when Congress does not assume the injuries inflicted on its Members as done to itself, the Constitution would no longer be worth living under. (Hinds, p. 1083.)

I have thus dealt at length with the history of this article of the Constitution, in order to show that there has been no difference in opinion in regard to what it means and no break in the current of the construction from the time that the letter was first submitted to the convention which framed the Constitution down the decades passed until the last decision rendered upon the question by the Supreme Court of the United States. Some have doubted and even disputed that this provision of the Constitution would include calling a Member of Congress to account by a written communication from another outside of Congress, whatever may be its character. I have no doubt in my own mind that Mr. Platt's letter to me comes squarely within its provisions. If this is true, I contend that this House has the right first to direct that Mr. Platt appear before the bar of the House for writing this letter, and, second, that the House has full authority, if it chooses to exercise it, to issue a decree against Mr. Platt either for censure, reprimand, and probably to fine for contempt.

However, in view of Mr. Platt's disclaimer in his last letter I shall not insist upon my constitutional privilege in this regard. I do not care to humiliate him by even having him cited to appear before the bar of the House. Neither do I have any wish to have him censured or reprimanded for his conduct, and I shall make no request along this line. I have no ill feeling for Mr. Platt, though I have a supreme contempt for his letter.

This is true notwithstanding he intended by writing his last letter to disclaim and atone for the injustice he did me in his first letter. I do not believe that Mr. Platt was sincere when he wrote the last letter, because it does not take the sting out of his first letter, and Mr. Platt knows it. His profession of friendship for me as set forth therein is likewise insincere. To my mind it has the taint of Judas.

I have been coming in contact with the public in the capacity of a practicing attorney, the State's prosecuting attorney, judge of the superior court, and to some extent as a business man for nearly 40 years, and yet this is the first time within my whole public career that I was told that I had done something which was "utterly unworthy of me" or that I had said something on account of which I was virtually ordered to render an apology.

Whether Mr. Platt is dealt with as an individual, an ex-Congressman, or a Government officeholder, his offense, in my judgment, is no less odious.

No individual with the proper sense of decency would indite such a letter to one who claims he is a friend.

No Member of Congress or ex-Member of Congress who has the proper conception of the true instincts of a gentleman would voluntarily send such a communication to one of his colleagues.

No Government officer holding an appointment under the President of the United States and in one of the greatest institutions of the Government who has any intelligent regard for the proprieties of his position and who has that high sense of honor becoming one holding such a position would so debase himself.

The truth is, this letter is an evidence of duress or intimidation, or at least undue influence, which may have been heretofore put in operation and brought to bear over Members of this House in regard to pending legislation, particularly over members of the various committees. I do not make this charge, and yet this letter bears upon its face this deduction. Such influences, if sought to be exercised, can never be proved, because it is like the undertow of the ocean surf—it can be felt but can not be seen.

His letter is full of pride, vanity, and arrogance. The idea that a Representative in Congress should be so fearless as to criticize the policies of the Federal Reserve Board is a monstrous proposition to Mr. Platt. He would punish those of us who criticize his acts as members of Parliament were punished in the days of Elizabeth. Threats and intimidation are his weapons.

I attribute much of this ugly phase of the vice governor's character to the position which he now occupies and also to the unprecedented majority which the Republican Party had over the Democratic Party in the November elections of last year. The truth is, the appointment to the office which he now holds and this great majority in favor of the Republican Party have turned the vice governor's head. Mr. Platt, a gentleman polite and courteous when in Congress, has become Platt "the imperious," as vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

In passing I remind this high-browed officer that he may not hold his office always, and also that a great majority has frequently been followed by a small minority. Many believe in the truth of the remark of the Duke of Wellington, who said: "Next to a great defeat, the greatest disaster is a great victory."

Mr. Platt wrote this letter with knowledge of this constitutional provision or through ignorance of it.

If he wrote the letter in ignorance of this provision, then I doubt the wisdom of his appointment to the position he now holds. If he wrote the letter with full knowledge thereof, then he has built for himself a monument to which the finger of scorn should point as long as his infamy may be remembered among men; and yet this is paying him more or less distinction, because there is a sacredness and a sense of grandeur about a monument, even though erected by one's own folly; and, on second thought, I prefer to liken his conduct in writing this letter to the dying mackerel in the sunshine, which "stinks as it rots and rots as it stinks."

One of the troubles with Mr. Platt is he has little sympathy for the southern people. This may be due to the fact that he knows nothing about their suffering and sacrifices. As an evidence of this conviction of mine I call your attention to the fact that he referred to the bankers and money lenders of my State as culprits. A culprit is a criminal. That is, a culprit is one who is accused or convicted of a crime. To charge over the legal rate of interest is usury, of course, and the Federal Reserve Board is the chief exponent of such conduct, but the only penalty in most of the States is to forfeit the interest and to make void in some States deeds and other allegations which are given to secure debts. There is no criminality attached to it in the sense of penal servitude, and yet Mr. Platt deliberately brands a great class of the people of Georgia as criminals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, this being a personal matter, I ask unanimous consent to proceed until I finish it. It will take me only two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman knows that the Chair would be very glad to accommodate him, but the time has been limited by the House. The gentleman was granted unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

Mr. BRAND. That was simply for the purpose of publishing the correspondence, provided I finished my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is precluded from submitting his request in view of the fact that the time was limited by the House before going into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRAND. Has not the committee the right to waive that and grant me unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The House has, but the Chair doubts whether the committee has.

Mr. BRAND. Has not the committee the right to waive that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CRISP. The rulings have been to the contrary.

Mr. BRAND. I will ask the gentleman from California to give me a few minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I regret to say that there seems to be so much interest in the bill that I shall have to use all of the eight minutes which I have remaining. I would like to accommodate the gentleman, but I am so much pressed for time that I can not do it.

Mr. FIELDS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. If I may be permitted, I will yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Georgia. Or if there is objection to that I will yield back two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky for the purpose of allowing him to yield it to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FIELDS. Then I yield to the gentleman from Georgia two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia for two minutes more.

Mr. BRAND. In his first letter Platt strikes like a scorpion, but after some one told him of this constitutional provision he runs away like a peacock who struts on the lawn and about the homestead like a king when the sun shines, but is always the first of the fowls in the lot to take to the barn house when a storm arises and the thunder begins to roll.

The ire of Platt recalls to my mind a convulsion of rage on the part of the great Friar Bungey, one of Lord Lytton's characters, when he roared forth at one who differed with him as follows:

Darest thou unslip thy boundlike malignity upon great Bungey? Knowest thou not that he could bid the walls open and close upon thee; that he could set yon serpents to coil round thy limbs and yon lizards to gnaw out thine entrails?

That is Platt, the vice governor of this powerful board; that is the way the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, which holds the power of life and death over a Nation of suffering people, feels when a Member of Congress criticizes the board's policies.

The truth is Mr. Platt felt called upon to defend his chief, Gov. Harding, because without Gov. Harding's consent and O. K. Mr. Platt never would have been appointed as a member of the Federal Reserve Board. Many are satisfied that without the recommendation of Gov. Harding, whom I personally esteem—who stood high with President Wilson—Mr. Platt never would have been appointed. For this reason I dismiss him from further consideration, because there is much truth in the saying of the Patriarch Isaiah, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib."

In one of the Voorhees beautiful periods he says:

It is a historic fact that Vesuvius was not known to have volcanic fires in her bosom until they broke forth in a devastating deluge near the dawn of the Christian era. For nearly a thousand years we can see by the light of history a contented, unsuspecting, prosperous people building villages and cities around the base of that famous mountain, ascending its easy, sloping, and fertile sides, erecting homes, planting vineyards, rearing generation after generation in peace and happiness, with no thought of danger. If anyone more curious or more intelligent than the rest ever detected and pointed out as an evil omen a thin line of smoke rising above its crater and mingling with the clouds, he was doubtless silenced as a disturber of public tranquillity and an enemy to the public credit. The entombed ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii, however, remain to illustrate the power of nature's secret unheeded forces.

This is a historic simile of the awful avalanche, terrible and destructive in its consequences, which was suddenly turned loose last year upon a happy and prosperous and contented people of the cotton-growing States, engulfing in its mighty currents men, women, and children, white and colored alike, leaving many of them homeless, many penniless, and almost all hopeless, whose cries of distress and appeals for help have been heard across a continent and lashed the shores of every European nation where heretofore cotton has been king in the marts of trade and the markets of the world, and yet cotton, the ark of the covenant to the South and the hope of humanity, is no longer king, but has been stripped of its royalty and at present is almost as impotent as Prometheus fettered to the rocks of Mount Caucasus with every vulture known to avarice plunging their beaks into its vitals.

This picture I tried to paint in my speech, believing as I did and do yet that the policies of the Federal Reserve Board promulgated last year brought about this great calamity, and yet because I, among many others in and out of Congress, honestly and freely expressed my views, this czar of the Federal Reserve Board levels his guns at me with a malignant intolerance unprecedented.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, in relation to the issue of culpability, I summon to the witness stand the great multitudes of farm producers and laboring people from the South and West, the greatest farming sections of this Republic, and let them testify from their sorrow, suffering, and destitute condition who shall be the victim of their crucifixion, and upon this issue I am willing for the present to write its verdict and posterity to record its decree. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the time for debate is practically exhausted, yet no one has opposed this bill. I am not going to give my support to this bill that is under consideration. I may be the only one who votes against it, but I am going to vote against it. It involves 2,500 patents. Of these 2,500 the board sifted down to 27 claims that it considered, and then it gave its real final consideration to 7 out of the 27. It states that these 7 that it did give consideration to involved $14,800,000, and Lieut. Commander Loftin, on page 18, states that the balance of them, in his judgment, would run up to $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. Judging from that statement, I believe this bill might involve $50,000,000 of claims that could be turned over to these three men to settle. My friend from California [Mr. KAHN] may be willing during these dog days to pass that kind of a bill and thus pass the buck, because it is a little unpleasant for Congress to have to pass on these little matters of claims involving only $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. He may be willing to shift the burden over to three unidentified men, but I am not willing to delegate the duties of Congress to any three men in any such way as that. [Applause.] It is a matter involving $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. Are you going to retain the reins of government and the purse strings of the Treasury in your hands, or are you going to turn them over to somebody else? Every one of my Republican brothers on the other side of the aisle has been criticizing this Cabinet officer and that Cabinet officer for the amounts of money that they have paid out on claims during the war and since the war, and there will be room for further criticism if you leave such an amount as this to three men in this Government to settle. Let us retain jurisdiction of these cases ourselves. Let these claims come through the proper channels. Let them bring them before the Court of Claims. Let them produce their evidence. Let there be a Government attorney there to look after the interests of the Government. Let there be a Government judge there to decide the cases, and not three Cabinet officers who know nothing about them and who in turn will have some of their subs to look after the matter. For this job will be delegated to subs in the end.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As I understand it there are seven claims which aggregate $14,800,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning which in this bill they propose to pay $2,500,000 in cash settlement, but they do not stop with that. They provide that the Committee on Appropriations hereafter shall appropriate such sums of money as this unknown board may decide to be due to other claimants, and those other sums of money in my judgment might amount to $50,000,000, although Lieut. Commander Loftin says in his judgment the amount is only $30,000,000 to $40,000,000.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not. I have just a little time. What are you going to do about it? Just because there are only a handful of men here are you going to follow our distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], just because he says for you to pass it? Are you going to shut your eyes blindly and vote "yes" with him like you voted on the tariff bill? I am not going to do it. I am going to reserve to myself the responsibility of my vote, that responsibility which my people placed upon me when they had confidence enough to send me here, and I am going to vote against any such wasteful measure as this. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, some gentleman asked me whether this would provide for the patents seized by the Government before the war. I call attention to a statement which was sent to the committee by the three Secretaries of the Government who are advocating this legislation:

It was considered that under the conditions established by the acts of 1910 and 1918, the Government would be involved in a multiplicity of suits under patents and that these would be different in character, depending upon the time at which the infringement complained of occurred and, in some cases, upon the question of whether the Government or the contractors with the Government were original or contributory infringers.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I would like to finish this statement which explains this very thing that I was asked about:

The varying conditions of warranties affecting different contracts, some warranties being by the contractor and some by the Government, in so far as liability of patent infringement is concerned, introduced a serious complication. Under these warranty contracts the Government naturally became interested in suits pending anywhere in the United States involving alleged infringement of letters patent under which claims might be made against the Government.

So it is very evident that in order to avoid appearance in a great multiplicity of suits the Government officials deemed that by coming to some amicable arrangement all around a great deal of time, labor, and possibly expense could be saved. Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman is talking right on the point. Is that the only excuse that the gentleman has to give why these claims should not be put through the Court of Claims, namely, that these Government officials do not want to be bothered with them?

Mr. KAHN. That is not all.

Mr. BEGG. That is the only reason that the gentleman gave.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from California gave no reasons of his own. He has just taken what the officials of the Government charged with the duty of settling these claims, one of whom is the Attorney General, sent to the Committee on Military Affairs as the reason for this legislation.

Mr. BEGG. Is that the only reason they gave, that they did not want to appear in court?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. BEGG. What is the reason?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will read the report he will find two or three pages of it.

Mr. BEGG. I have read the report, and got no satisfaction as to why these claims amounting to two and a half million dollars could not be settled in the court.

Mr. KAHN. The accumulated claims amounted to thirty millions.

Mr. BEGG. I recently got from the War Department a list of the men that claimed to receive damages from the Government during the war, and there were 10,000, the amount of which runs up to nearly $3,000,000,000. One man has received over ten millions, and I think these claims should go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. KAHN. There is no use in getting excited about this. This Government is going to deal fairly with the people who dealt fairly with it. During the war we passed the so-called Dent bill as a part of the military legislation. And there was a good deal of dissatisfaction about it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. No; I want to make this statement: That law was finally adopted by Congress, and I dare say that a great many claims that the gentleman from Ohio speaks of were included in those claims.

Mr. BEGG. Nearly all of them.

Mr. KAHN. Nearly all. But if these people had not given assistance to the Government during the war probably the steel mills of this country would have had to close up and the people employed there would have been thrown out of work.

Mr. BEGG. One word on that proposition—

Mr. KAHN. I will not yield further. I do not know anything about these claims. I know there was a great demand made upon Congress for remedial legislation. People who entered into contracts with the Government on account of some informality in the completion of the contract were without any remedy whatever. They could not receive a cent, and therefore that legislation was passed to allow these men to go before Government officials and show, if possible, that they had lived up to their contract; they asked that they be paid for the contract they had performed for the benefit of the Government and at its request. Do you want to object to that kind of thing and refuse to settle claims of the citizens of this Government? Thank God, I was born with an entirely different view regarding the scope and character of my Government. I was brought up to believe that whenever a citizen had a fair claim against his Government he had a right to have that claim adjudicated.

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. Adjudicated where?

Mr. KAHN. Wherever the law of the land said he might get his adjudication.

Mr. WYANT. And we have the Court of Claims established for that purpose.

Mr. KAHN. They could get their remedy in the Court of Claims in a very few cases and in others they could not. Under the Dent Act you could not go to the Court of Claims at all, and that is what the gentleman from Ohio was speaking about.

Mr. WYANT. One more question. Does this great committee believe—

Mr. KAHN. I anticipate the gentleman's question. As I have said, the Committee on Military Affairs is a hard-working committee of this House. It wants to deal fairly by the citizens of the country and the Government. I think Members of this House will generally say that the committee has acted fairly by the Government and by the people. Now, this claim came to us in a peculiar way. We were told that if prompt legislation could be enacted we would save many millions of dollars. We had complete hearings upon this bill. The committee was convinced that these people had just claims, and if the Government could settle these claims for two and a half million dollars it would be better than to pay out eight or ten or fifteen million dollars through the Court of Claims. So the committee decided to report this bill favorably.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to take the time of the committee upon this bill this hot afternoon, and I would not do so if I did not believe it a dangerous bill for us to pass. According to the report, there are 2,500 patent claimants. These have been finally sifted down by this interdepartmental radio board to 147. The total amount of the claims filed were $30,000,000, and seven claims amounted to $14,000,000. They have a certain small number of these claimants to agree that they will take two million and a half dollars to settle their claims. But notice what the bill says:

Provided, That this provision shall not be so construed as to deprive owners of patents who shall not accept settlement under this act of any rights of action conferred by the acts for the protection of the owners of patents approved June 25, 1910, and July 1, 1918, respectively.

Now, you are settling by this bill with a few of these people who have patents, and all the balance of the holders of $30,000,000 of claims have a right to go to the court under those and have their claims adjudicated, and it will be up to Congress to make settlement.

You are opening up an avenue here for the presentation of claims, a veritable Pandora's box, the end of which none of us can see. If we wish to settle these claims we ought to know now what the amount is to be. If it is to be $2,500,000, let us pay and be done with it, and if it is to be $5,000,000, and they are just claims and Congress thinks they ought to be paid, let us pay them; but do not let us pay some few of the owners of these patents $2,500,000 and leave $27,500,000 worth of claims unsettled and compel the claimants to go to the Court of Claims. There is no telling when we will ever reach the end of the payment of these claims if you pass this bill. Is this bill so important that we must consider it under a special rule? It seems to me we ought to have more Members here in order to consider it. We ought not to undertake to take money out of the Treasury of the United States under these special rules when the matter can be postponed until a larger membership is present. The President has told us that the Treasury is depleted of funds; that we are unable to take care of the soldiers as we would like to take care of them, and yet we pass special rules to pay owners of patents to the amount of $2,500,000. If I thought this were just and right I should certainly favor it, but I know it to be most unjust to the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman says that we pass a special rule to do this thing. As a member of the Committee on Rules I voted to bring this matter up for consideration of the House, but I reserved the right to vote against the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am glad the gentleman reserved that right. It is entirely proper that he should vote against it. It would not be like him to support such claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy, acting jointly, are hereby authorized to adjust, pay, and discharge on a fair and equitable basis any and all just and meritorious claims against the United States for or on account of the use or manufacture by or for the United States of any patented invention relating to radio communication in cases in which such patented invention was used without agreement with the owner as to compensation therefor; such settlement of claims to cover both past (whether prior to, during, or after the war) and future use where practicable in all cases, and to be based on the determination by such agency as the said Secretaries and Attorney General have designated or established or may designate or establish, of all questions of infringement, validity of patents, and value of such inventions: Provided, That this provision shall not be so construed as to deprive owners of patents who shall not accept settlement under this act of any rights of action conferred by the acts for the protection of the owners of patents approved June 25, 1910, and July 1, 1918, respectively; and for the payment of such claims the sum of 2,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided further, That no payment shall be made under the authority herein conferred to any person or persons entitled to recover unless such person or persons shall within a period of six months from the date of the approval of this act accept in writing the amount awarded jointly by the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of offering a preferential motion.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert the dollar sign before the figures "2,500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from California.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion which I understand the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] is going to offer is preferential over anything else, inasmuch as it is a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman had not said that was his motion.

Mr. MANN. He was not recognized, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to recognize the gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the committee after a bill has been read has a preference to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 13, before the figures "2,500,000," I move to amend by inserting the dollar sign.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 2, line 13, before the figures "2,500,000," insert the dollar sign.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment which the gentleman from California has offered, provided it be followed up by the striking out of the figures, leaving the dollar sign there. I am not in favor of this measure. I think it is time we stopped being quite so tender in respect to the rights of people who file exorbitant claims against the Government for the use of their property during the war. This is an entirely new procedure, a little different from the Dent Act, but it extends the vicious provisions of the Dent Act further than I believe is warranted. These three Secretaries will not pass on these claims. Why, they did not even write the letter which is contained in the report. Here is a letter written within two or three months after the present Secretary and the Attorney General took office, and listen to what it says:

A board designated "Interdepartmental radio board" was appointed by ourselves consisting of experts in the War Department, Department of Justice, and the Navy Department to consider all such claims, each with reference to its own merits, and the merits of all the others. Such board has been considering the matter for nearly three years—

And they had been in office less than two months when they wrote that letter. It shows that the letter was written by some of these eminent experts, who succeeded in sifting down claims for radio patent violations to the sum of $2,500,000. This is but an entering wedge. If this measure is passed it will permit claimants not yet heard of to come in and file their claims against this administrative board, and I do not think that under the circumstances a board of administrative officers should pass on and adjudicate claims that raise highly technical questions and legal propositions. We have a Court of Claims, but these three distinguished Secretaries through their three eminent experts say:

Realizing that the use by the Government had infringed the rights of many patentees, while some of the claims possess little or no merit, and that a fair and reasonable determination of the whole matter would be difficult, long drawn out, and expensive to the Government as well as to the claimants—

Mr. Chairman, a "fair and reasonable determination" might be difficult, but we have officials in the Government service whose duty it is to participate in hearings before judicial tribunals, to represent the Government, and that is where these claimants ought to go. We had a condition bordering almost upon scandal in some of the adjudications that were made or sought at least under the provisions of the Dent Act. It will not do any great amount of harm to permit these people to await a fair and reasonable adjudication of these claims, rather than to permit some subordinates down in three of the great departments of the Government to settle these claims upon a just and equitable basis.

It is provided in the bill:

Such settlement of claims to cover both past—whether prior to, during, or after the war—and future use, where practicable, in all cases.

While, of course, it could not be so written into this law, I think it would be a very wise provision to write into some law that when this great Government issues letters patent they should contain a reservation that in case of war the Government shall have the right to make use of those patent rights without compensation to the owners thereof and compensate them only for property that is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I apologize for asking that extension of time, but the chairman of the committee used 30 minutes in favor of the bill and there was no opportunity for people to get time in opposition except the energetic gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRANTON], who got three minutes, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the law of 1912, which authorized the Government to take over in time of war or emergency radio stations and the apparatus therein, was limited to the stations and the apparatus, and there was no provision for taking over patents or compensation for patents.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, some of this was done without any authority of law whatever, because right in this letter from which I quoted it is said that they did it before we entered this war, simply because the Government found it necessary to use apparatus of various kinds. It was done before we entered the war.

Mr. CHINDELOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield?

Mr. CHINDELOM. Of course, it has not escaped the very astute mind of my friend from Massachusetts that these claims are not the ordinary kind of claims that have been passed upon heretofore; these are speculative.

Mr. WALSH. They are highly technical claims, some speculative, and they involve questions which involve judicial determination the same as other patents have to submit to when their rights are claimed to have been violated.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to state before I ask my question that, as one member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I did not have an opportunity to be present while the hearings were being had on this bill. It was my understanding—

Mr. MANN. This bill was introduced one day and reported the next.

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. MANN. The day after.

Mr. WALSH. Introduced June 13 and reported June 15.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman allow me to explain that?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield, but it will probably consume all my time.

Mr. KAHN. I will get the gentleman more time if I can, but the bill was introduced some weeks before it was reported out. It had some amendments, and in order to get the bill before the House in the form that the War Department itself desired, and the committee desired, they ordered me to reintroduce the bill in its present shape and to report it with the committee's amendments, and the next day—

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. This bill was introduced one day and two days later was reported.

Mr. KAHN. But it had been before the committee some weeks.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how it was originally introduced or what changes were made. Nobody said anything about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, however, that I understand the purpose of this bill as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs is not to open the door of the Treasury to all these claims but to have the other effect; that is, to close the door. But the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated there are 2,500 of these claims—

Mr. WALSH. No; 2,500 patents.

Mr. McKENZIE. Of the four hundred and some odd claims, every one will have the right to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MANN. They still have the right.

Mr. McKENZIE. As I understand the purpose of this bill, it is to have this commission of experts sift out those who have claims that have some merit and act upon those, and in that way save the Government perhaps many millions of dollars that might be allowed by the Court of Claims.

Mr. WALSH. It is very apparent that the gentleman is not present at the hearings, because that is not what the bill means at all. [Applause.] The statement here is made:

Such a task has been stupendous and has required a force of experts—expert to begin with, but which became more expert daily in its specific task as it gained knowledge from experience.

No wonder we have been unable to reduce the personnel of some of these departments down here. They have been sifting out claims with some merit for the Committee on Military Affairs, and, by the way, the War Department had fewer claims filed than the Navy Department; the larger number are in the Navy Department, which run amuck, so to speak, amongst the radio telegraphers and those owning apparatus several months before we entered this war.

Mr. KAHN. The Navy Department owns almost all its radio stations.

Mr. WALSH. They may own some radio stations, but they had the larger number of claims for violation of these patents.

Mr. KAHN. They own most of the radio stations.

Mr. WALSH. They state here that—

Under our judicial system, and with extreme difficulty in presenting patent cases, it is probable that the task could not have been covered in the courts in 25 years in the same comprehensive but centralized method of the board.

Why, what they have done and what they intended to do will not relieve the courts. These claimants still have the right in case of an adverse decision, in case they do not present their claims to this board, to go to the courts and have a judicial determination of whether their rights have been invaded on any of these 2,500 patents.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman states that if they did not present their claims to this board under this bill—can not a claimant present his claim to the board and after a determination by the board, if he does not accept the determination, still go to the Court of Claims?

Mr. WALSH. I think under the language of the bill that is true.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. KAHN. I believe the gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs stated that they had sent letters to all the claimants asking them to put in writing just what their claims were and whether they would agree to accept this settlement and I understand they all agreed with the exception of two, the De Forest Co. and another company that had, I think, a $150 claim.

Mr. BLANTON. The De Forest Co. has a $2,000,000 claim.

Mr. WALSH. That is the information we get through this sifting process. We do not know as a result of this legislation how many claims now unknown may spring up encouraged at an opportunity to get into the Federal Treasury through the office of some assistant or some subordinate of these three great departments. These departments down here, as I understand, are also to administer the law. They have no business whatever to pass upon claims and to adjudicate legal questions and technical questions, and while during the war and immediately after in the great pressure Congress had established a precedent somewhat akin to this method now we are to go further away from constitutional conditions. It is time that we should go back and put these people where they belong and take away this extraterritorial jurisdiction, so to speak, from the administrative offices of the Government. For that reason I am opposed to conferring the authority contained in this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. And I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment that is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has already offered an amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the Chair would have to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in opposition to the amendment, pending the recognition of some other Member to offer an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the report in this case states, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has already called the attention of the committee to, that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Attorney General stated that the Interdepartmental Radio Board was appointed by "our selves." The letter stating this is dated May 14. They went into office on March 4, and having said that they, "ourselves"—and everybody knows what "ourselves" means—had appointed this Interdepartmental Board and stated that the board had been in operation for three years. That of itself is an indication of the whole thing.

The Secretary signed this letter automatically, without knowing what was in it, and prepared by somebody in one of the departments. Who was authorized to name the board in the first place? Where was any authority granted by Congress to these three department heads to settle claims of this kind against the Government? There was no authority. Proceeding without authority to begin with, and then having proceeded without authority, they assume that they can settle these questions better than somebody else properly authorized to settle them.

This bill does not settle any claims at all. It authorizes the payment of claims to men who are satisfied with what they get; it does not settle any claims if a man is not satisfied with what he gets. It pays claims to people who receive and are satisfied that they are receiving their whole claim, but those who think they have more of a claim can sue in the Court of Claims. That is a one-sided arrangement. It does not give any protection to the Government whatever.

Then, these patent claims are all intricate. They are conflicting. It takes courts after years of testimony sometimes to determine the validity of a patent and the infringement of a patent and whether patents conflict or not. Here it is proposed to have three boys up there, not judicial officers, not judges, not experienced in patent law, perhaps, say that a certain patent covers a certain device used by the Government, and pay one man for that device, while another man claims he owns it. The latter can go into the Court of Claims and can prove that he owns it and the Government has to settle with him. There is no adjudication by this bill. There is no determination by this bill. It is simply giving a chance to those who can reach into the Treasury, but does not shut one single hand out of the Treasury. I believe it is a good time to stop this thing of presenting bills and claims without merit, simply because somebody wants them. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, by striking out the figures "2,500,000" on page 2, line 13.

Mr. MANN. That is not an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. He moves to amend by adding the dollar mark in front of the figures "2,500,000."

Mr. KAHN. The amendment is certainly not an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend his amendment by offering a substitute to strike out the figures "2,500,000."

Mr. MANN. That is not a substitute. We should proceed to present these amendments in an orderly way.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I rise to submit a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the proper way would be to dispose of the amendment now before the House and then take up the other ones.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey to the amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Before the dollar sign insert the words "not more than," so as to read, "not more than $2,500,000."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on that.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I offer a preferential amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not care anything about it, but of course that is no more an amendment to the amendment than was the one proposed by my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. It is offered for that purpose, and the Chair can not pass upon it—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I make the point of order that it is not an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, when they insert a certain thing I can add something to the amount that was inserted, and I add the words "not more than" to the dollar mark.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment simply proposed to add the dollar sign. Now, I think the gentleman is clearly in order if he endeavors to amend the amendment by adding additional words that are not found in the bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. If it is an amendment to the amendment, would it not be virtually "not more than a dollar sign"?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression when the amendment was offered inserting the dollar sign that it was not more than the amount provided in the bill. Now, this amendment provides that the words "not more than" shall precede the dollar sign. The Chair is inclined to believe that this amendment would be an amendment to the amendment, and so holds.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may not be limited absolutely to five minutes, because the committee does not understand this bill.

During the war the United States absolutely seized the use of all radio patents, for which there were 2,500. They seized the use of the great initial patents of the Marconi Co., and all sorts of improvements on them that are mentioned in the hearings. Suits were brought against Government contractors whom the Government had guaranteed and warranted in putting those machines in their vessels, or in manufacture, or whatever they might be. Hundreds of suits were pending, and the Government sent word to the courts and to the litigants, saying, "We can not try these suits now and take our experts away from this work. Stop the suits, and we will do justice by you." And they stopped their suits.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it not a fact that the Government also seized upon the persons of something more than 4,000,000 young men?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We have tried to take care of the young men. Now we are trying to take care of these patentees whose property was confiscated by the Government. They made no objection, because they were patriots, just as the young men did not make objection. Now, at the end of the war here is this fact—the United States used the great radio patents. There were 2,500 patentees who could bring suits in the Court of Claims on their various patents against the Government under the claims act, and certainly they could sue the contractors of the Government who used these devices all over the United States, and the question is, What can be done that is just? There ought to be some way of disposing of the matter, as is done in claims against a vessel, by bringing everybody into court. There is no way of doing it through the Court of Claims. It is not practicable to have lawyers and agents going over the country separately litigating these cases and seeing that they do not interfere with each other. It would be interminable. And so, Mr. Chairman, the United States appointed a board of experts, assisted by the Attorney General, who sent word to everybody, saying, "We are going to try and adjust this matter in a fair way," and about three or four hundred patentees came before them. The rest were indifferent and would not come, and only two of them have said that they would not be bound by the decisions of this board, namely, the De Forest Co., with $2,000,000 involved, and another concern with $150,000 involved, both of which cases the board thought had no merit and was willing to defend the cases in court. There were other claims that were serious, including that of the Marconi Co., amounting to $14,300,000, as they stated them, and other claims stating no figures, all aggregating $30,000,000, and the claimants were willing to make an agreement to satisfy all these claims, amounting to $30,000,000 by the payment of $2,500,000. The United States officials state in their report how much they will pay to each claimant, and this bill authorizes them to go ahead and make that settlement. It is a fair thing, and for the benefit of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia moves to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it not in order to recognize somebody in opposition to the amendment before this motion is acted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. It is always in order to move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is true; but the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] offered an amendment to the amendment and debated it in the affirmative, and I think recognition should be given to some one against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair having recognized the gentleman from West Virginia, he thinks he ought to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this Congress is in extraordinary session. I think it was the purpose and desire of the Executive in assembling this Congress in extraordinary session that the Congress should attend to matters of extraordinary importance—legislation affording relief in matters that could not wait, including tariff revision, tax revision, relief for our soldiers, and the peace resolution, ending the war and repealing the war laws. It was never intended that Congress should stay in session all summer long, and that Members have dinned into their ears by every committee of the House arguments in favor of the enactment of bills of all sorts and character. It was never intended that Congress should at this extra session take up and consider miscellaneous war claims, of which there are billions floating around. There are but few Members present, and the attendance will grow smaller as the days go by, and if Congress should continue in session and measures of this character were allowed consideration the country would be in constant danger.

The bill before us authorizes the appropriation of $2,500,000 to be credited on claims aggregating $30,000,000 asserted by certain people for alleged infringements of alleged patents relating to radio communication during the war. The recommendation of the Military Affairs Committee is that we vote out of the Treasury, as a starter, two and one-half millions of dollars, and as many more millions of dollars as the so-called interdepartmental committee shall see fit to dish out to Tom, Dick, and Harry for alleged infringement of patents. These claims are nebulous—as thin as air and as weak as skimmed milk. The Government, in justice, does not owe them, and they ought not to be paid.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the time has come when we should assert our independence of all committees and exert ourselves to defeat measures of this kind. [Applause.]

A gentleman suggested that if these patent holders had not come forward with their inventions and patents the Government could not have operated and we would not have won the war. I will say that if they had not come forward they ought to have been hanged. That is what I have to say about it. [Applause.]

And so we see here an effort to push ahead of meritorious measures a bill for the relief of tramp corporations that have patented so-called inventions for radiogram communication, and I will venture the suggestion that not a few of them never were able to radiate anything more than a lot of hot air. [Laughter.] And that is what we have been treated to this afternoon by some of those in support of this bill. I am in favor of defeating the bill, and I shall move to strike out the enacting clause. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has well said, this Government ought in time of war to have the power to use freely the patents issued by it, because the rights of the patentee are nothing more nor less than a grant without consideration—an act of mere grace by the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

A number of claims have not been paid. Many public-spirited men and women in this country all during the war devoted all their time and their energy, without money and without price, to help win the war. The soldiers, as has been suggested by a Member this afternoon, went forward and fought, and many of them bled and died, and yet those living have not been compensated. Their bill for claims has been sidetracked in the Senate, while this bill is being given right of way in the House. The dead can not be compensated, for they are gone to the dominions of silence.

If the claims of the Aerograph people be just, let them go to the Court of Claims and there vindicate their rights, if any they have. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized on the amendment just offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

The CHAIRMAN. For or against the amendment?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I ask to be recognized against it in order that I may speak for it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in the first place I do not know how it happened that this bill got before the Committee on Military Affairs. It should have been referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the only committee of the House that has any jurisdiction over radio matters, and the committee which has handled all other radio matters which have been legislated upon by this House and the only committee that knows very much about the subject, judging from the action and report on the bill under consideration.

We have here the anomalous situation of a bill being introduced for the relief of men who so far failed to come into court with clean hands; that according to the report there were 2,500 patents involved and over 400 claimants, and after investigating them this board decided that there were only claims of 7 concerns as to 27 patents that were meritorious. They propose to pay these 7 claimants $2,500,000 for claims aggregating over $14,000,000 for 27 patents.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. For a brief question.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Can the gentleman tell us what standard of measurement of damages they adopted?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No; we have no light on that subject. Now, in the hearings are set out these seven claimants whose claims it is proposed to recognize and who are to be paid this $2,500,000. In that list is the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Co., with a claim of $6,000,000. This Government purchased from that same company during the war, as I thought, most, if not all, of their property, and paid several million dollars for it, and that which they did not purchase they took over under the radio act, and, as I understand, have paid the Marconi Co. for the use of it. I can not understand how they could still have any claim against the Government. Yet it is one of the seven claims that are recognized by this board as being meritorious.

That simply gives you an indication of what this bill means and the extent to which it will go. These seven claimants have claims to the extent of $14,860,000, and we are not told the amount of the claims of about 400 other claimants on 2,500 patents that they do not propose to settle and who, of course, will still have the right to go into the Court of Claims and prosecute their claims there.

Furthermore, as has already been suggested, it is proposed to recognize claims accruing "whether prior to, during, or after the war," although the title of the bill states that it is to provide for the "settlement of damages and compensation for infringement of radio patents connected with the prosecution of the war." Furthermore, it proposes, in line 7 of page 1, to settle claims "for or on account of the use or manufacture by or for the United States of any patented invention"; and it was explained by the chairman, as I understood him, that this was to cover devices which the Government had purchased from manufacturing concerns in which infringements had been made upon patents of others by those manufacturing concerns, and upon the theory that if the Government used them it was legally responsible. Now, any lawyer knows, and for that matter every sensible man knows, that, even if the Government is liable at all in a case of that kind, it can be only a secondary liability. These infringing manufacturing concerns would certainly be primarily liable for the infringement of the patent, no matter by whom used. And yet this bill proposes to authorize the settlement of such claims before it has even been judicially determined that such manufacturing concerns have infringed upon any patents in the manufacture of apparatus sold to the Government, and, of course, before efforts have been exhausted to first hold responsible such manufacturing concerns, if guilty of infringement. It is a preposterous proposition. This is a vicious bill, and the motion to strike out the enacting clause should prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Under the rules of the House has not any Member the right to speak in opposition to the amendment? The two speeches that have been made so far have been in favor of the amendment. I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] desires to speak against the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment to strike out the enacting clause close in five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry. Is this debate running under the 5-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Is not the debate already exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee desires to give five minutes more, it can do so.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, first, that under the rule the motion to strike out the enacting clause is not debatable, although chairmen have held that it is.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to go and study the rules.

Mr. BLANTON. Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole have held on various occasions that there may be two speeches, and two only, upon a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MANN. What is the point of order against my motion, if the gentleman has one?

Mr. WINGO. The point of order is that the debate is already exhausted.

Mr. MANN. That is not a point of order against my motion.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's motion was to close debate on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Yes; in five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. And I make the point of order that debate is already exhausted.

Mr. MANN. That is another question. That is no point of order against my motion.

Mr. WINGO. It is if the debate is already exhausted.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman's motion has the effect of extending the debate.

Mr. KAHN. The rule allows five minutes for and five against the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order that under the rules debate is exhausted.

Mr. FIELDS. I make the point of order that there has been no debate against the motion.

Mr. MANN. The point of order is not against my motion.

Mr. WINGO. The motion is to close debate, and I make the point of order that debate is exhausted under the rule, and you can not do that in committee.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman makes the point of order that debate is exhausted, but that has nothing to do with the motion I made. I insist that the point of order does not lie against the motion I made.

Mr. WINGO. Debate is already exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Debate is not already exhausted as far as that is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that debate has not been exhausted, because there has been no debate in opposition to the preferential motion.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. If debate is not exhausted, anybody opposed to the amendment is entitled to five minutes without motion, and it is mere surplusage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that debate is not exhausted on the amendment, and the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is the question before the committee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I judge from the way the debate has drifted that Members have jumped to a very hasty conclusion in regard to the purport of this bill. I am not on the Military Committee. I am opposed politically to the majority of the committee, and yet I must frankly say, after mature consideration, that I think this is a perfectly defensible bill; not only defensible but highly meritorious, in that it puts an end to litigation. The Secretaries of the Navy and War and the Attorney General in forming this interradio board displayed mighty good judgment, and the interradio board, in disposing of these claims without litigation, has accomplished a wonderful, commendable piece of work.

Now, gentlemen, have patience, do not rant wildly against this thing simply because it means the expenditure of $2,500,000. Why, suppose these claimants should be driven into the courts to enforce their claims. Do you not see that they might hang there for years and that the delay might not be more injurious to them than to the Government itself? Suppose some of these devices commandeered during the war should jump into great importance. To-day they can be bought for a song. To-morrow they may be worth millions of dollars. It takes from 5 to 20 years to decide these patent claims in our courts. When the cases are decided the Government, some day in the future, is likely to be mulcted out of millions.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The claim of the Marconi Co., one of the chief basic patents, is for $6,000,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. Gentlemen talk about this interradio board not being the proper tribunal in which to hear claims. What of that? Are we here to protect the Government or to make lawsuits? One would imagine that there was a lawyers' union and that their representatives in the House were determined that nothing shall be done unless done by the lawyers. We really ought to thank God that these men had common sense enough to settle these claims without putting them in the hands of lawyers and without compelling the claimants to go to law.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Marconi claim is $6,000,000 and there are 27 other claims, they must think that their claims are not worth very much if they are willing to settle for $2,500,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will answer that. A compromise is always possible where there is a certain amount of patriotism involved. These ideas and devices were taken by the Government during the war, and I think you visualize the reason.

Mr. KAHN. They were promised that if they would take this money the claims should be settled up very quickly.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I am not a lawyer, but if they started out with four hundred and odd claims with the idea of settling with seven claimants with 27 patents for $100,000 for every patent, or approximately $425,000 for each of the seven claimants, in my estimation this committee has not done very much toward the settlement of the four hundred and odd claims.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is a hasty conclusion and wrong in its figures, too. I am willing to give the interradio board the credit of exercising judgment and discrimination in the exclusion of the unjust claims. Here we have an adjudication practically upon 149 patents, and out of all they find only 27 claims worthy of allowance, which the Government can settle for $2,500,000. I am bound to say that I consider this a very commendable achievement.

Rather caustic reference has been made to the letter of Secretaries Weeks and Denby, which is also signed by Attorney General Daugherty, and it is pointed out that they take the credit for the appointment of the interdepartmental radio board, although it has been working on these claims for three years. It is said, in effect, "We have found Cabinet members in a lie. They had only been in office two months when the letter of May 14 was written. Notwithstanding the apparent paradox, let me advise the learned gentlemen who are so hasty to criticize that the present Cabinet officials have full right in an official communication, signed with their official titles, to accept responsibility for the official acts of their predecessors. The man may change, but the office remains. There is no interregnum. They were, therefore, right when they said the board was appointed by themselves."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia to strike out the enacting clause: The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRIFFIN) there were—ayes 87, noes 11.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers, and pending that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. GRIFFIN (interrupting the count). Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred and twenty Members present, a quorum.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request for tellers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCOTT of Michigan, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7111 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the recommendation of the committee.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on striking out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the enacting clause was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the enacting clause was stricken out was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAWES, for 10 days, to appear in Jefferson City, Mo., to attend hearings on good-roads legislation before the Missouri State Legislature.

To Mr. BANKHEAD, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. CLOUSE, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. WHEELER, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. KNUTSON, indefinitely, at the request of Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota, on account of illness.

NORWEGIAN SHIP "INGRID."

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to press his point before the reading of the message?

Mr. BLANTON. At the request of the minority leader, I withdraw the point of no quorum for the present.

The Clerk read the message, as follows, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by the Government of Norway against the Government of the United States based on the action of the authorities of Hudson County, New Jersey, in holding for their appearance as witnesses in a criminal case in that county, in violation of treaty provisions between the United States and Norway, as the Norwegian Government alleges, three members of the crew of a Norwegian ship called the Ingrid, and I recommend that, as an act of grace, and without reference to the question of the liability of the United States, an appropriation be made to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

In view of the comparatively small amount of this claim and in view of the lapse of time since the case was first presented to the Congress, I hope that provision may be made for the payment thereof at an early date.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 22, 1921.

MUSCLE SHOALS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing therein a letter from Henry Ford to Gen. Beach, containing an offer for the lease and future operation of Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is the official letter released by the Secretary of War?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a photostat copy of the letter released by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEARBORN, MICH., July 8, 1921.

Gen. LANSING H. BEACH,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

Sir: In response to your advice that the Government invites an offer for the power at the Muscle Shoals Wilson Dam on my part or on the part of a company to be formed by me (and throughout this proposal to be called "the company," I hereby and through you place at the disposal of the President, the Secretary of War, and Congress the following tender:

1. If the United States will promptly resume construction work on the Wilson Dam and as speedily as possible complete the construction of the dam and progressively install hydroelectric facilities and equipment for generating 600,000 horsepower, then the company will agree to lease from the United States the Wilson Dam, its power house, and all of its hydroelectric and operating appurtenances, together with all lands and buildings owned by the United States connected with and adjacent to either end of the Wilson Dam, for a period of 100 years from the date of the completion of the dam and its power-house facilities; and the company will pay to the United States 6 per cent on the remaining cost of the locks, the dam, and power-house facilities, taken at $20,000,000, in payments of $1,200,000 annually, except that during the first six years of the lease period payments shall begin and be made annually as follows:

Two hundred thousand dollars one year from the date when 100,000 horsepower is generated and continuously ready for service, and thereafter $200,000 annually at the end of each year for five years. After the first six years payment of $1,200,000 shall be made annually at the end of each calendar year during the lease period.

2. At the beginning of the seventh year of the lease period and annually thereafter the company will pay to the United States a sum not greater than $39,537 to retire during the remaining period of 94 years the total cost of the Wilson Dam and its power house, substructures, superstructures, machinery, and appliances, including locks, all taken at $40,000,000, the sinking-fund investments to bear the highest rate of interest obtainable, but not less than 4 per cent per annum.

3. The company will further agree to pay to the United States $35,000 annually for repairs, maintenance, and operation of the dam, gates, and locks at Wilson Dam, all repairs, maintenance, and operation of the same to be under the direction, care, and responsibility of the United States during the 100-year period.

4. The company will furnish the United States free of charge, delivered at a point on the lock grounds designated by the Chief of Engineers, electric power not to exceed 200 horsepower for the operation of the locks.

5. If the United States shall accept the above proposal for leasing the Wilson Dam and its power installation, then as a condition of acceptance the company will ask that immediately upon release of suitable construction equipment and facilities at the Wilson Dam and upon the release of labor forces the United States will forthwith proceed to construct and fully complete with reasonable promptness Dam No. 3 as designed and proposed by the United States engineers, the power installation at Dam No. 3 to be taken in this proposal at 250,000 horsepower.

6. When the lock, dam, and power-house installations at Dam No. 3 are completed the company offers to lease Dam No. 3, its power house, and all of its hydroelectric and operating appurtenances for a period of 100 years from the date of the completion of the dam and its power-house facilities, and the company will pay to the United States 6 per cent on the cost of the dam, lock, and power-house facilities taken at a cost of $8,000,000 in payments of $480,000 annually, except that during the first three years of the lease period payments shall begin and be made annually as follows:

One hundred and sixty thousand dollars one year from the date when 80,000 horsepower is generated and continuously ready for service, and thereafter $160,000 annually at the end of each year for two years. If and when after the first three years the entire power-house generating equipment of 250,000 horsepower is continuously ready for service, payments of $480,000 shall be made annually at the end of each calendar year during the remaining 97 years of the lease period.

7. At the beginning of the fourth year of the lease period and annually thereafter the company will pay to the United States a sum not greater than $7,010 to retire during the remaining period of 97 years the total cost of Dam No. 3 and its power house, substructures, superstructures, machinery, and appliances, including locks, all taken at $8,000,000, the sinking fund investments to bear the highest rate of interest obtainable, but not less than 4 per cent per annum.

8. The company will further agree to pay to the United States $20,000 annually for repairs, maintenance, and operation of dam, gates, and lock at Dam No. 3, all repairs, maintenance, and operation of the same to be under the direction, care, and responsibility of the United States during the 100-year period.

9. The company will furnish the United States free of charge at Dam No. 3, to be delivered at a point on the lock grounds designated by the Chief of Engineers, electric power not in excess of 100 horsepower for the operation of the lock.

10. If the United States shall accept the above several proposals in their entirety, then the company offers to purchase from the United States the following properties, viz:

(a) All of the property at nitrate plant No. 2 and its adjacent steam-power plant, land, buildings, material, machinery, fixtures, equipment, apparatus, appurtenances, tools, supplies, and the right, license, and privilege to use any and all of the patents, processes, methods, and designs which have been acquired by the United States (and which the United States has a right to transfer and assign the use of to any purchaser of nitrate plant No. 2), together with the sulphuric-acid units now in storage on the premises.

(b) All of the properties of the United States at nitrate plant No. 1, its steam power plant, land, buildings, material, machinery, fixtures, equipment, apparatus, appurtenances, tools, supplies, and the right, license, and privilege to use any and all of the patents, processes, methods, and designs appertaining to said nitrate plant No. 1, which have been acquired by the United States; but nitrate plant No. 1 shall not be operated as an air nitrogen fixation plant as designed to be.

(c) All of the property at the quarry of the United States, known as the Waco Quarry, including all material, buildings, quarry tracks, machinery, railroad tracks, tools, and other equipment.

(d) Also the steam plant, built and owned by the Government at Gorgas, Ala., on the Warrior River, including material, buildings, machinery, fixtures, apparatus, appurtenances, tools, supplies, and the transmission line from the Gorgas steam plant to nitrate plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals; the United States to acquire title to the right-of-way lands necessary along the transmission line, and also to acquire the title to the land and site occupied by the steam plant and by all Government buildings and other structures at the Gorgas steam plant.

For the foregoing plants and other properties, as set forth and described above under a, b, c, d, the company offers to pay the United States five million dollars ($5,000,000), the terms of payment to be agreed upon between the Secretary of War and the company, the Secretary of War having the authority to dispose of said plants and other properties as above enumerated.

11. At any time prior to the expiration of said lease period of one hundred (100) years, the company shall have the right to negotiate with the Government for a renewal of the leases for the two above dams, their power houses, etc. In the event of disagreement as to terms of the renewal, the United States and the company shall each appoint an arbitrator, and these arbitrators shall choose a third. The decision of the arbitration board of three shall be final and binding upon both parties.

12. If the United States agrees to sell, and the company purchases these several properties, nitrate plants, quarry, steam power plants, transmission lines, etc., and at prices and on terms mutually satisfactory, the company will operate nitrate plant No. 2 to approximate present capacity in the production of nitrogen and other fertilizer compounds, with the following special objectives:

(a) To determine by research on a commercial scale whether by means of electric furnace methods and industrial chemistry, there may be produced fertilizer compounds of higher grade and at cheaper prices than the fertilizer-using farmers have in the past been able to procure, and to determine whether in a broad way the application of electricity and industrial chemistry may do for the agricultural industry of the country, what they have economically accomplished for other industries.

(b) To maintain nitrate plant No. 2 in a state of readiness to be promptly operated in the manufacture of materials necessary in time of war for the production of explosives.

13. If the above offers of the company are accepted by the United States, and if the agreement between the Secretary of War and the company can be made for the purchase of the above-described properties, it will naturally and reasonably follow that the buyers of fertilizers, will desire to be assured that fertilizers produced at nitrate plant No. 2 shall be sold at fair prices and without excessive profits.

14. To meet this reasonable expectation on the part of the farmers of the country who buy fertilizer, the company proposes that the maximum net profit which it shall make in the manufacture and sale of fertilizer products at nitrate plant No. 2, shall not exceed 8 per cent. The company also suggests that a board be created composed of officially designated members and representatives of farmers' national organizations, such as the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange and the Farmers' Union, together with a representative from the Bureau of Markets of the Agricultural Department (to be an ex officio member of this board, serving in an advisory capacity, without right to vote) and two representatives of the company. It is expected that the board shall have access to the books and records of the company at any reasonable time, and that its duty shall be to investigate costs and revenues and to determine, for public information, whether the profits of the company are being kept within the established limit of 8 per cent, as above set forth; and it is also suggested that this board determine upon the territorial distribution of fertilizers produced at nitrate plant No. 2. If and when this board can not agree upon its findings and determinations, then the points of disagreement by the board, at any time, shall be referred to the Federal Trade Commission for arbitration and settlement, and the decision of the Trade Commission shall be final and binding upon the board.

15. Whenever, in the event of war, the United States shall require any part of the operating facilities of nitrate plant No. 2, for the production of materials necessary in the manufacture of explosives, then the United States shall have the immediate right, upon notice to the company, to take over and operate the same for the national defense of the country, and the company will supply the United States with hydroelectric power necessary for such operations, together with the use of all patented processes which the United States may need in time of war for munition purposes, and which the company owns and has the right to use, and any of the company's personnel and operating organization, required in times of war for operating any part of nitrate plant No. 2, in the manufacture of materials for explosives, shall be at the disposal of the United States. All duly authorized agents and representatives of the United States shall have free access, at all reasonable times during the lease period, to inspect and study all of the operations, chemical processes, and methods employed by the company at nitrate plant No. 2, provided such agents and representatives shall not use the information and the facts about any of the company's operations, except for the benefit and protection of the United States.

16. It will be obvious to you that, should the above proposals and offers of the company be accepted by the United States, there will be many details in the lease and purchase agreements to be worked out; but it is believed that the above will furnish all of the information required for decision by the United States upon the tender herein submitted.

17. The above proposals of the company are submitted as a whole and not in part.

18. The plans of the company with respect to its hydroelectric power needs are such that it is hoped that you, and those to whom you refer these proposals, will be able to arrive at prompt decisions regarding the company's offer, and that it can be confidently expected that the undersigned will very soon receive an answer to this communication.

Respectfully,

HENRY FORD.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly at (4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 26, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 26, 1921.

(Legislative day of Friday, July 22, 1921.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhulse, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5651) to survey the Yazoo River, Miss., with a view to the control of its floods.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 163) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Eighty-eighth Division Association for their reunion at Des Moines, Iowa, tents, cots, mattresses, blankets, and galvanized-iron buckets, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield for that purpose?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for that purpose, if I shall not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	McNary	Simmons
Ball	Harrison	Moses	Smith
Brandeggee	Heflin	Nelson	Smoot
Broussard	Johnson	New	Spencer
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sterling
Caraway	Kellogg	Nicholson	Swanson
Culberson	Kendrick	Norbeck	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Norris	Trammell
Dial	King	Oddie	Underwood
Dillingham	Ladd	Overman	Wadsworth
Edge	La Follette	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	Lenroot	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	McCormick	Ransdell	Warren
Fletcher	McCumber	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	McKellar	Robinson	Watson, Ind.
Hale	McKinley	Sheppard	Willis
Harrell	McLean	Shortridge

Mr. MOSES. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. KEYES], who is detained from the Senate by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is detained from the Senate on account of the hearings on the tariff bill before the Committee on Finance. I ask that this notice may stand for the day.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is absent because of a death in his family.

I wish to announce also that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] is unavoidably absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute affecting the proposed legislation now under discussion, Senate bill 1915, and ask, as there is no print yet made of it, that it may be read, and I then desire to submit a few remarks upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wonder if there will be any objection on the part of the Senator from Minnesota and others, both in the Senate and in the White House and in the Cabinet who have prepared this substitute, to members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry remaining in the Senate while it is being read. We have not been able to find out anything about what has been going on for two or three days or to get a copy of the proposed substitute.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska are unnecessary and unjust. Before the proposed amendment is read perhaps I should say that the amendment is offered by me not through any hostility to what the chairman and his committee are attempting to do. I had not expected until late last evening to offer it. The substitute does not represent my ideas entirely. I mean by that that its provisions were principally suggested by the officers of the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Minnesota asked to have the substitute read. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. KELLOGG. I did so ask.

Mr. RANDELL. I should like very much if it could be read before the Senator begins his remarks.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall ask that it be read before I discuss it.

Mr. RANDELL. That is what I thought, and I am anxious to hear what it is before the Senator begins his remarks.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Louisiana will wait a moment, he will learn that I am not going to discuss the amendment until it is read, but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered some remarks which, personally, I feel I ought to speak about before the amendment is read.

The provisions of the amendment in the nature of the substitute have been suggested almost entirely or principally by officers of the War Finance Corporation, and, I might say, by Senators on both sides of the Chamber. It is not the only amendment which has been offered. Many amendments have been offered to accomplish substantially the same thing which this proposed amendment intends to accomplish.

Furthermore, the Senator from Nebraska ought not to take exception to that any more than the other amendments which have been offered in the Chamber. I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, it is out of no hostility whatever to the Senator from Nebraska or his committee, with whom I have worked on many Agricultural bills, and whom I am anxious to aid in every way I can.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not wish the Senator to take what I said in any offensive way. I simply felt that it was proper and that I would not be doing my duty if I did not state that the bill now the unfinished business had been the unfinished business since the 18th day of July. It has been known for some time that officials of the Government outside the Senate were secretly preparing a substitute for the bill. Members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have not been consulted, and have been unable to get a copy of it. Since these negotiations of which the Senator is speaking had been conducted without any opportunity for any member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to get sight even of the substitute, when, after all the discussion which has gone on, they waited until we ought to be voting on the bill and then have a substitute brought in without consultation with any of those who have been friendly to the legislation, it seemed to me that it was not out of place to suggest that probably these same persons would object to members of the committee listening to the secret substitute.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to be entirely fair about the matter. I wish to lay the whole matter before the Senate. I am not criticizing the Senator. The Senator from Nebraska has done a great work in bringing before the Senate the subject of the condition of the agricultural communities of the country. It is a bill, however, of very great importance which involves principles of far-reaching effect in our commerce and business in this country and abroad. It is a bill that I believe has been studied by Senators generally more than any measure that has come before the Senate for many months. The officers of the War Finance Corporation have been asked since the bill was brought before the Senate to make suggestions. They have been so asked by many Senators. I am not the spokesman for everyone who has discussed the amendment which I have offered or the other amendments. I have simply consented to offer an amendment, to explain it to the Senate, and to make a speech on the subject this morning. I did not get the amendment completed so that it could be introduced yesterday.

I think a matter of this great importance, which involves the question of whether the Government is going again into business, deserves the most careful consideration of the Senate.

Mr. President, I shall comment on the proposed substitute, by sections, and as I have not, as I have stated, had an opportunity heretofore to offer the amendment and have it printed, I will ask that the Secretary read it, when I shall proceed with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

The War Finance Corporation act, as heretofore amended, is further amended by adding after section 21 thereof the following sections, to be known as sections 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27:

"Sec. 22. Whenever the board of directors of the corporation shall be of the opinion that conditions arising out of the war, or out of the disruption of foreign trade created by the war, have resulted in or may result in an abnormal surplus accumulation of any staple agricultural product of the United States, which is normally exported in substantial quantities, and that the ordinary banking facilities are inadequate to enable producers of or dealers in such products to carry them until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner, the corporation shall thereupon be empowered to make advances, for periods not exceeding one year from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms, not inconsistent with this act, as it may determine—

"(a) To any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in the United States in dealing in or marketing any such products, for the purpose of assisting such person, firm, corporation, or association to carry such products until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner. Any such advance shall bear interest at a rate of not less than 1 per cent in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrower is located at the time when such advance is made.

"(b) To any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which makes or has made an advance or advances to any such person, firm, corporation, or association as is described in paragraph (a) of this section for the purpose therein set forth. The aggregate of advances made to any bank, banker, or trust company shall not exceed the amount remaining unpaid of the advances made by such bank, banker, or trust company, for purposes herein described. Such advances shall bear interest at rates fixed by the corporation.

"Sec. 23. Notwithstanding the limitation of section 1, the advances provided for by section 21 and section 22 of this act may be made until July 1, 1922. The corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such advance or advances through renewals, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for the payment of any advance made under authority of section 21 shall not be extended beyond five years from the date upon which such advance was originally made, and the time for the payment of any advance made under authority of section 22 shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such advance was originally made.

"All advances made under section 21 or under section 22 of this act shall be made against the promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments, in writing imposing on the borrower a primary and unconditional obligation to repay the advance at maturity, with interest as stipulated therein, with full and adequate security in each instance by indorsement, guaranty, pledge, or otherwise. The corporation shall retain the power to require additional security at any time.

"Sec. 24. Whenever in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation the public interest may require it, the corporation shall be authorized and empowered to make advances upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine to any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which may have made advances for agricultural purposes, including the breeding, raising, fattening, and marketing of live stock. Such advance or advances may be made upon the promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments, in such form as to impose on the borrowing bank, banker, or trust company a primary and unconditional obligation to repay the advance at maturity with interest as stipulated therein, and shall be fully and adequately secured in each instance by indorsement, guaranty, pledge, or otherwise. Such advances may be made for a period not exceeding one year and the corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such advance through renewals, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for the payment of any such advance shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such advance was originally made.

"The corporation may, in exceptional cases, upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, purchase from domestic banks, bankers, or trust companies, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other instruments of indebtedness secured by chattel mortgages, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, or other instruments in writing conveying or securing marketable title to staple agricultural products, including live stock. The corporation may from time to time upon like security extend the time of payment of any note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument acquired under this section, but the time for the payment of any such note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument was acquired by the corporation.

"Advances or purchases may be made under this section at any time prior to July 1, 1922.

"Sec. 25. The aggregate amount of all advances made under sections 21, 22, and 24, and of all notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other securities purchased under section 24 remaining unpaid, shall not at any one time exceed $1,000,000,000.

"Sec. 26. Whenever in this act the words 'bank, banker, or trust company' are used, they shall be deemed to include any reputable and responsible financing institution with resources adequate to the undertaking contemplated.

"Sec. 27. In order to enable the corporation to carry out the purposes of this act, the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to furnish to the corporation for its confidential use such reports, records, or other information as he may have available relating to the financial condition of national banks to which the corporation has made or contemplates making advances, and to make, through his examiners, for the confidential use of the corporation, examinations of banks, bankers, or trust companies, other than national banks, to which the corporation has made or contemplates making advances: Provided, That no such examination shall be made without the consent of such bank, banker, or trust company."

SEC. 2. Section 21 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended by striking out paragraphs (b) and (c) thereof, and by striking out at the beginning of the first paragraph the letter (a).

SEC. 3. The first paragraph of section 12 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"Sec. 12. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time its notes or bonds in an amount aggregating not more than twice its paid-in capital, such notes or bonds to mature not less than six months nor more than five years from the respective dates of issue, and may be redeemable before maturity at the option of the corporation, as may be stipulated in such notes or bonds, and to bear such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the board of directors, but such rate or rates of interest shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or bonds shall have a first and paramount floating charge on all the assets of the corporation, and the corporation shall not at any time mortgage or pledge any of its assets. Such notes or bonds may be issued at not less than par in payment of any advances authorized by this title, or may be offered for sale publicly or to any individual, firm, corporation, or association at such price or prices as the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may determine."

The power of the corporation to issue notes or bonds may be exercised at any time prior to January 1, 1927, but no notes or bonds shall mature later than July 1, 1927.

Sec. 4. Paragraph 1 of section 13 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"That the Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the maturity limitations of the Federal reserve act and to regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to discount the direct obligations of member banks secured by such notes or bonds of the corporation and to rediscount notes or other negotiable instruments secured by such notes or bonds and indorsed by a member bank. Discounts or rediscounts under this section shall be at an interest rate equal to the prevailing rate for eligible commercial paper of corresponding maturities."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I suggest, if possible, that the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by me be printed at the earliest possible moment.

With the permission of the Senate, I now desire to give my reasons for opposition to some provisions of the original bill introduced by the Senator from Nebraska and to explain as well as I can the provisions of the proposed amendment.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska, in making his speech upon that bill, stated, with commendable frankness, that he had no pride of opinion concerning it and that if any plan could be produced which would accomplish the object better than it could be accomplished by the bill introduced by him he would welcome it. I believe that to be his attitude.

I shall not take the time of the Senate again to go over the question of necessity for aid to the agricultural districts of this country. It has been done so ably by the Senator from Nebraska and other Senators that it would be a work of supererogation for me to attempt it. In passing, however, let me remark that the distress for want of credit on account of the tremendous decrease in the prices of agricultural products, which seem to have been the first commodities to have been affected by a pronounced and material reduction in prices and because of which the farmers of the country, North and South, East and West, are in a very precarious condition, warrants the Government in going much further in legislation to-day in aid of the farmers than in normal times; in fact, almost as much as we would in time of war, because we all know that agriculture lies at the foundation of all our prosperity and of all our business, both in the country and in the city.

I assure the Senator from Nebraska and other Senators that I would rather some one else much better able than myself to do so would attempt the explanation of this subject. I have taken the burden only because of my desire to do whatever I can to assist to the fullest extent to use the resources of the banks, the trust companies, and the Government to aid the agricultural interests of this country.

Mr. President, before explaining the particular provisions of the bill as I understand them, permit me to make some suggestions as to my views on certain of the provisions of the original bill. I realize that on this question of the principle of the Government going into business there is a difference of opinion. I belong, however, to the old school that believes that the least government in business and the most business in government, as we have often heard, is the best. I do not believe that the Government should engage in the purchase and sale of the products of the farm or manufactured products unless it is an absolute necessity to save the very life of the Nation.

Mr. President, I consented to vote for one bill which authorized the Government to engage in the purchase and sale of farm products. I did so under protest, and our experience since then has taught me that it was unwise. I shall not go into the details of that experience. The appalling losses and waste in the operation of the railways are fresh in the mind of every Senator. I do not criticize any individual, but the very fact of the Government by central bureaus undertaking to carry on the business of 260,000 miles of railroads made it impossible and led inevitably to a breakdown. The appalling losses which have been brought to our attention in the Shipping Board, Senators, should warn us against Government operation; and in that I make no criticism. Much of it occurred through the necessity of hasty preparation of a merchant marine during the war, and I am not going back to criticize; but, Senators, in times of peace let us use all the resources of this Nation that we can, and only bring the Government into it when it is necessary to save the very industrial life of the Nation; and in this case I do not believe that is necessary.

Mr. President, the particular provision of the bill to which I object in that respect is the one authorizing this corporation to buy agricultural products, either in their natural state or prepared or manufactured, from any person within the United States, and to sell such products to any person or Government or subdivision of Government outside the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, has the Senator another copy of the substitute which he has offered?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a copy which I shall want to use in my remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator wants to use it, I will not ask him for it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A rush print has been ordered of the amendment, and it is hoped that it will be here soon.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I object to this provision of the pending bill. If our experience in the past teaches anything, this would not be in the interest of the farmers of this country.

We had some experience with the Wheat Corporation. We were led to believe that in order to conserve the food of this country, to supply our allies first, and to sell the balance to neutral countries to which we were under obligations, it was absolutely necessary that the Government should fix the price of wheat and certain other cereals, and buy and sell them through the Grain Corporation. Now, what was the result? The result is so fresh in the minds of Senators that it hardly needs explanation by me. The Grain Corporation was compelled to or at least did fix the price of every bushel of grain that was bought in the market in the United States, and was the only purchaser and the only exporter; and since it could fix the price of purchase and fix the price of sale it did not, of course, lose money, because anybody who can fix the price of the product he buys and has an unlimited market, as we had in war time, and can fix the price when he sells, can, of course, prevent loss.

What was the result, Mr. President? The result was that while the price of wheat, through the abnormal demand of war and the cutting off of the supply from Russia, Argentina, and Australia by reason of war and want of ships, went up all over the world, and it was selling at $2.50 a bushel in the United States when the President fixed the price at $2.25, and while during the two years the Grain Corporation—and I do not criticize it, because I think it was managed as well as it could be—lost no money, the farmers of the country lost hundreds of millions of dollars which they could have gotten out of the normal prices in the market.

Now, Mr. President, it is inevitable that a Government corporation which is authorized to purchase and to sell farm products and the manufactures of farm products would have to fix the price, and would be the only purchaser and the only seller in export.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I am anxious to know—I have just heard this substitute read—the difference between the substitute that is offered by the Senator from Minnesota and the bill that is pending.

As I heard it read, the substitute proposes to substitute the War Finance Corporation for the proposed new corporation which is to handle these products under the Norris bill. That is one difference?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The substitute, as I heard it read, is for the purpose of making advancements to firms, corporations, and banks on agricultural products?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; for both domestic and foreign business.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and the Senator includes in the substitute also live stock?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. There is nothing in the Senator's substitute that proposes to make advancements to anyone outside of the United States who might desire to purchase agricultural products in the United States, as I understand.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I shall come to that provision. I think it would be very unwise to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. I am simply trying to get in my mind just the difference between the substitute and the pending bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is quite right.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Norris bill is different from the substitute in that the Norris bill proposes to have this new corporation act as an agent in the sale of agricultural products, and the substitute does not, as I understand. Is that right?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Another difference is that the Norris bill, of course, provides for the buying and selling of agricultural products, and the substitute does not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Another difference, as I heard it read, is that the substitute proposes to make advancements to firms and corporations and banks within the United States on agricultural products, and the Norris bill provides for making advancements to individuals, raisers of agricultural products, banks, and corporations in the United States as well as without the United States. Is that right?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think the Norris bill goes far enough in making advances to domestic banks, corporations, individuals, and so forth, in carrying domestic products until they can be exported. The substitute bill specifically covers that; and if the Senator will allow me, in just a few moments I will take up the sections, if I do not trespass too much upon the patience of the Senate, and explain my view of the differences.

Mr. President, just a further word.

Mr. HARRISON. One more question. It is suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that I get clearly before the Senate, if I can, the advancements to foreigners. There is nothing in the substitute that proposes to authorize the War Finance Corporation to make advances to any person outside of the United States who desires to purchase agricultural products in the United States?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; but the War Finance Corporation is now, and has been all the time, making advances to domestic corporations and individuals for use in carrying exports to foreign countries.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that thoroughly.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the substitute does not authorize the direct sale to foreign Governments and foreign institutions and taking their paper separate and distinct from American institutions.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and the Norris bill does.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

Now, Mr. President, as I said before, the Grain Corporation cost the farmers of this country hundreds of millions of dollars; and I do not believe that the farmers—at least, those farmers and farm representatives with whom I have consulted—wish the Government again to go into the price-fixing business.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me to press a little further the question asked by the Senator from Mississippi a moment ago, as I understand the Norris bill, any moneys which might be advanced here by the Government, or the proceeds of the sales of bonds, might be given to foreign Governments or to foreign firms. In other words, it would be increasing the financial favors which we are extending to foreign Governments; and to the extent that this money is loaned to foreign Governments it would cripple the corporation here in making loans directly to our domestic firms. Is that right?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is entirely right, in my view of the matter.

Mr. POMERENE. So that if these loans amounted to $1,000,000,000 we would be increasing the present indebtedness of the foreign Governments and their nationals from eighteen billions, as they are now, to nineteen billions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Exactly. I will explain to the Senate in a few minutes my view of certain of these provisions and the reasons why I think they are preferable. Allow me one further word.

We must remember that the provisions of this bill not only authorize the purchase and sale of farm products but all the manufactured products of the farm, all the cotton goods made on the farm, and boots and shoes. It is, I believe, a well-established principle of trade that where the Government comes in with the amount of capital which this bill would authorize it practically becomes, as during the war, the only purchaser and the only seller, and nobody believes that a billion dollars will handle even the grain and cotton crops of this country, to say nothing about the manufactures from farm products. If we are going to attempt what this pending bill contemplates, we would have to make an appropriation far in excess of anything we are dreaming of doing to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's substitute does not provide for manufactured products?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; it covers everything, as far as the aiding of exporting goes. But it does not authorize any purchasing and selling.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; I wanted to get the Senator's idea. I know the amendment proposed to the original bill included farm products in their manufactured state. It was the idea of the committee in proposing that amendment to include in the products this corporation could deal in such things, for instance, as flour and canned meats. We had no idea of the corporation dealing in boots and shoes—

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. Or calico or cotton prints, and we never thought, and I do not think now for a moment, that this corporation would do that. I take it that if we are to include farm products we ought to include flour, because we would rather export flour than wheat. I think that is conceded, to begin with.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator is entirely right.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to get the Senator's judgment. Supposing the amendment were not agreed to and that the bill simply covered the exportation of farm products, does the Senator think that would include flour?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think that would be sufficient.

Mr. NORRIS. We wanted to include canned meats and cured meats.

Mr. KELLOGG. I entirely agree with the Senator from Nebraska that if we are going to have an independent agency to buy and sell, his bill goes no further than it is necessary to go, and no further than the War Finance Corporation has power to go to-day; and the Senator was entirely right in including the manufactured products, because, as the Senator said, it would do no good simply to sell wheat when it is in the interest of the American farmer and manufacturer and everyone else to sell flour instead of wheat. I do not criticize the Senator's bill in that regard.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator was criticizing on account of the fact that we did not have money enough to go into all of these other things.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; that was simply the question of buying and selling; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the committee never had any idea that they would go into those things, and I am safe in saying that if these words are too broad, and we can include the things that everybody concedes we ought to include, if there is a modification of the definition, we would welcome such a change, and if the term "agricultural products" includes flour and includes canned meats, we would not want to modify it at all. The only suggestion made before the Committee on Agriculture was that it had been held by some court that the baling of cotton was in the nature of the manufacture of a raw product, although I did not look it up and verify it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senator entirely misunderstood me. If we are going to authorize—

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the distinction between the Norris bill and the War Finance Corporation act, with reference to advances made for export purposes, is that the War Finance Corporation, as it now exists, is permitted to make advances upon goods, wares, and merchandise of all kinds.

Mr. KELLOGG. Farm products and everything else.

Mr. SIMMONS. Including farm products.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. For the purpose of financing their present exportation?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. This adds a provision to permit them to finance the exportation of agricultural products, which are not ready for exportation now, because they can not be sold to advantage if forced upon the markets of Europe at one time, and to enable them to hold them from one to two years and market them abroad as conditions may be favorable.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from North Carolina has accurately stated one of the principal features of this bill. I am not criticizing the committee's bill on the ground that it is too broad. It is not too broad so far as aiding in the exportation of farm products is concerned, not at all. I simply said that if a corporation, an agency, were organized to buy and sell, it would necessarily fix the prices, and the field in which it could operate in this case would practically give it the power to fix the prices of nearly everything made from farm products. I do not at all criticize the bill in so far as the attempt to aid not only in the exportation of farm products, but of all manufactured products, is concerned. That is necessary, and it is carried in both bills.

Now, just one word about extending credits to foreign countries, in answer to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I have thought about that considerably. The principal foreign Governments which buy our products, to which I will further refer before I finish my remarks, are, of course, Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Austria, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. Principally, of course, England, France, and Italy are the big purchasers of our products in Europe. They owe us $10,000,000,000, and there is now being negotiated the question of whether they shall pay the back interest, and, as I think I can show before I conclude my remarks, if they paid it all it might so unsettle exchange that we could not sell any farm products. But I am not an advocate of their not paying, as I want our Government to collect all it can of what is owing us.

But I do not believe it is wise that any agency should have authority to deal directly with and extend credits directly to foreign Governments. Mr. President, the moment we open the doors of this corporation to credits of foreign Governments, the propaganda and pressure of every nation in the world for credits would exceed anything we have ever seen in war time.

Mr. McCORMICK and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Illinois, who rose first.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to say to the Senator from Minnesota that there has come to my attention the instance of one of the new States of central Europe where the owners of the cotton mills are buying to the full extent of their legitimate credit, but their Government would prefer to borrow and to buy in this country, in order to distribute the products of the mills under some form of popular subvention.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is quite true, and I do not think there is any objection to stating that that is Poland.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire of the Senator where, under the substitute he has offered, he expects these farm products finally to be consumed? Does he think they will be consumed in foreign countries?

Mr. KELLOGG. To a very large extent in foreign countries, and I expect the War Finance Corporation to do exactly what they are doing now—take credits of institutions in foreign countries. Some of them are guaranteed by the governments of those countries, but the guaranty is subsidiary. It is not the obligation of a foreign government and a dealing directly between this corporation and a foreign government.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Does the Senator expect to get better security in foreign countries for a sale in foreign countries through the instrumentality of the substitute than through the bill itself?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think so. I would not say better security, I will say to the Senator, because I do not imagine any corporation would sell directly to a foreign government unless it thought its security was good. But I object to the principle, and I think it unwise and unworkable.

Mr. NORRIS. I am conceding, of course, that the Senator has a perfect right to make that objection. But I call his attention to the fact that his substitute, as well as the original bill for which his substitute is offered, contemplates, and it seems to me, as far as I am able to see, any plan must contemplate, eventually a sale on time in foreign countries, and when that is done, somebody must take the security, whether it is done through the instrumentality of one form of corporation or another. The Senator, I understand, criticizes the bill reported by the committee because these countries, as the Senator has said, are going to get too much; are going to try to borrow too much, and go in debt too much, and he gives acquiescence to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois that one government is now trying to get all the extended credit it may get. Would it not be possible under the substitute for the War Finance Corporation, if they wanted to, to give more credit to that government? I am not arguing that they would, but the criticism is that the corporation set up in the pending bill would have power to give credit that should not be given, and the Senator's substitute would give the power to another corporation without any limitation on it whatever. Are they not both equally dangerous? Is there any difference?

Mr. KELLOGG. The War Finance Corporation can not sell directly to the Polish Government and take the Polish Government's obligations. It can sell to Polish manufacturers or Polish merchants, and it can take their obligations, indirectly, only through an American concern, and not directly with the foreign Government or the foreign merchant, as stated by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not a fact that the credit is really a domestic credit?

Mr. KELLOGG. The credit is a domestic credit.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when we revived the powers of the War Finance Corporation for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of permitting them to make advances on exportations, we had in mind, of course, the requirements of the industrial nations of Europe for our products. Formerly these countries had been in the habit of buying, as our own mills had been in the habit of buying, a year's supply of cotton, we will say.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator, but I was about to explain that feature of the proposed substitute at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore, we framed our law accordingly. We permitted them to finance only for the purpose of exportation. It has not worked, because Europe can only buy two or three months' supply at best. She is in no condition to buy in three or four months what she is going to consume in her mills in a year. That leaves the surplus here, and it has to remain here until European or other foreign purchasers are ready for it, and we desire to finance it while it is being held for that ultimate purpose. The substitute provides for that.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was about to come to that feature of the proposed substitute.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly to interrupt the Senator, because he is making a very interesting speech and I am delighted to listen to it, but it seems to me right at this point it is quite pertinent to ask how he expects to get any credit from nations whose bonds to-day are not worth a cent and whose money is not worth a cent in the market. We have been speaking of Poland—

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I wish Senators would be a little patient. I realize that this is a dry subject.

Mr. FERNALD. Not at all; it is exceedingly interesting, but I do wish that I may have an answer to my question.

Mr. KELLOGG. My reasons for believing that it is wise to take an existing agency—the War Finance Corporation—are these: In the first place, the War Finance Corporation has had four years of experience in, to a certain extent, the same kind of business in which we now propose to have it engage. It has a capital of $500,000,000 paid in. At one time it issued $200,000,000 of bonds, found a ready sale for them, and those bonds were paid inside of a year. It now has available in the Treasury, ready to take hold of this export proposition for the purpose of extending credit to domestic banks and concerns, exceeding $400,000,000. It has an organization consisting of men of great experience, a board of directors known to Senators, and a manager, Mr. Meyer, who I think has not only the confidence of the public but the confidence of the Senate and the confidence of the farm organizations of the country. He has already done a great deal in the limited way in which he has carried on the business.

As far as possible we ought now to avoid the creation of new agencies, new corporations, new bureaus, and new associations. We organized many during the war.

In the haste of preparation for war, in the feverish effort to get ready for the great conflict, there were many organized that were really not a necessity. If we have one now that is functioning and has the capital and which could perform the services, I believe it to be wiser to use that agency.

As to the board and its officers, I think no one would suggest that it has not been managed wisely, so let us use it to the extent we can. I believe we can use the War Finance Corporation to better advantage than to create a new corporation. Many Senators know what it has done. I am not going into the details, but we realize that some of the great staples which we must export are cotton, grain and flour, live stock and the products of live stock. There is not a nation on the face of the earth using cotton for manufacture to-day to which the War Finance Corporation has not a stock ready to deliver and sell for cash or credits which are handled through local domestic exporters or firms and corporations.

In the case of Poland, mentioned by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], they have sold all the cotton Poland wants direct to her manufacturers, taking their obligations which are guaranteed by their banks, and have handled them to the entire satisfaction of everyone without the loss of a dollar. The manufacturers of Poland to-day do not want the Government to buy their products. I speak with assurance from having talked with men who are familiar with the subject. I am sure Senators who are familiar with the business in the cotton States will bear me out, that that is one branch of the business which has been conducted with a large degree of benefit. I think, as I go on, I can explain why the powers of the War Finance Corporation are not now broad enough to aid the local banks and institutions now carrying farm products until they can be sold in foreign countries, and that is one of the principal provisions of the proposed substitute.

Now, Mr. President, it is true that the necessity for domestic credit is much greater than it was before the war, for the reasons mentioned by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in his question to me. Formerly the principal nations of Europe using cotton and grain and flour made their purchases, and especially of cotton, a year's supply in advance, because the stable market for exchange had varied but slightly from month to month and the ability to obtain credit in their own country enabled them to buy a year's supply of cotton, a year's supply of wool from the countries which sold wool, and a year's supply of wheat which they purchased at certain seasons of the year and carried as security to their manufacturers during that year.

They can not do that now. Why? First, because of the rate of exchange, which so fluctuates that no importer in a foreign country dares to purchase a year's supply of cotton. I remember an incident last fall when exchange on the 1st of August of last year between here and Great Britain was selling at $3.80, I believe, and on account of conditions then arising it went down to $3.30 and immediately stopped the exportation of goods to Europe and knocked prices down. No man dares buy a year's supply of cotton in England to-day with the rates of exchange fluctuating 50 or 60 cents or even 30 or 40 cents. It is worse in France and it is worse in Germany, Hungary, Poland, and other countries.

Again, they have not the capital. They must buy now from hand to mouth more than as they bought before, and this especially applies to cotton, which they manufacture as rapidly as possible and turn it over and over to get their money back. Therefore it is necessary for the American farmer and cotton raiser, the American seller and warehouseman, to carry this year's cotton crop, corn crop, and other crops, for a longer period than it was necessary to do before the war or even during the war, because during the war we could sell anything we had at almost any price we asked.

I think Senators who will apply thought to the subject will find that one of the principal things necessary in any legislation is to give some agency, the War Finance Corporation or some other agency outside of the Federal reserve bank, authority, temporary under the great exigency of this condition of things at the present time, to extend credits to the local banks in the country, many of which are not members and are not eligible for membership in the Federal reserve system, who are loaded up with farm paper, cotton paper, cattle paper, and all sorts of paper which must be carried until there is finally a market.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL. I have been under the impression that the principal need of our agriculture now is markets rather than credits. I ask the Senator how the substitute which he proposes would assist us in getting markets for the great surplus of our agricultural products that we have on hand?

Mr. KELLOGG. It proposes to extend credit not only to carry products domestically and relieve the country banks which are carrying them, but it proposes to extend credit to any person, corporation, firm, or bank engaged in exporting, in order to export and sell and to take the paper not only under certain sections running one year which might be renewed for another year but bonds which may run until July 1, 1927. It extends in fact all the assistance and all the credit which, I think, any corporation can safely extend in the export business. That is my opinion.

Mr. RANDELL. Then, if I understand the Senator, in each instance the credit will be extended to some individual or corporation in America, and that individual or corporation in America must extend the credit to the farmer?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL. So that there will be an American individual or corporation standing in every instance between the Government and any accommodation, if you please to call it such, that is given to foreigners in selling our products?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL. And we must have patriotic Americans in every instance willing to take the risk of these sales to foreigners. Is it not so?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly, Mr. President. America to-day is the greatest commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural country in the world.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me answer the Senator from Louisiana first, if the Senator please.

We have, I believe, the business capacity, the foreign commerce if properly handled, and the credit to place every dollar of American products in any country in the world that can be legitimately placed and sold. If the Senator wishes to organize a corporation or authorize the Government to go into the business of buying the products in this country and selling them to whoever may wish them in foreign countries, of course we can buy and sell unlimited quantities to countries that never will pay and to institutions which are insolvent. There are principles of finance, of international trade and commerce, which can not be violated without ruin to our own people and to our own institutions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish first to yield to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], but for a question only. I do not want to get into a general discussion.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he thinks that the amendment introduced by him to-day will encourage our exporters to increase exports? As I understand, manufacturers in foreign countries are willing to buy our exports and to furnish bank guaranties, and their Governments also are willing to furnish guaranties; but exporters in this country are somewhat timid about it, not so much on account of financial risk as on account of political risk. To my mind, however, when our exporters get the money through our Government they will feel that the Government will stand behind them in seeing that their debts are collected.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, if the Government wishes to buy and sell, there is no trouble about it buying and selling unlimited quantities of products to Austria, to Czechoslovakia, to Poland, to Turkey, to Russia, or anywhere else.

Mr. DIAL. I am not advocating the Government selling, but I am advocating the Government doing just what the Senator proposes—lending money to our exporters. Then, when the exporters know that our Government is their creditor, they will feel safe in believing that the Government will stand up and make their debtors settle with them.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not understand the Senator at first, but he is perfectly right. I will say now that as the result of my inquiries I believe that the actual aid which the War Finance Corporation has given to exports has not been measured by the number of dollars it has actually loaned for export purposes but by the encouragement, the psychological advantage, which it has given to our exporters, the exporters thinking that in some way the Government was behind them.

Mr. DIAL. And the amendment which the Senator from Minnesota now proposes will stimulate that feeling?

Mr. KELLOGG. It will stimulate it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me—

Mr. SMITH. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield first to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Minnesota caught the significance of the question which was asked him by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL]. I understood the Senator from Louisiana to be troubled about this point: If the advances were made to a firm, person, or corporation in order to enable them to hold their cotton until there was an export market abroad, the Senator's theory, according to the question as I understood it, was that the particular person, firm, or corporation would have to export the cotton or the product, whichever it might be, and that that would not be practicable. I do not know whether I correctly understood the Senator from Louisiana or not.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina misunderstood me. I did not say that the individual would be obliged to export the product, but I said that in case it were exported and sold it would in every instance be at the risk of the American individual or bank; that in every instance the American private citizen or private corporation would stand between the Government and a loss. If I may be permitted to say so at this moment, in the abnormal condition of the world at this time, when the whole world is topsy-turvy, when business of every kind and sort has been torn to pieces, the great institution known as Lloyds in England, which formerly insured any and every thing in the world that a man desired insured, from how a prize fight would end to the result of a business venture, and especially sales of export goods or sales to home concerns, now refuse to do so. Because of the condition of the exchange market in no place in the world of which I know is very extensive exportation being carried on. Exchange is so uncertain, it is varying so greatly from day to day, that the exportation business is being considered as a political business. Private concerns are afraid to go into it. It is a well known fact that only a few days ago one of the big banks in New York wrote off $15,000,000 of loss because of some of its export business.

I wish the Senator from Minnesota would take up some of those points now, for they are pertinent in this connection. Can the individual be induced to export, and thereby get rid of some of the surplus products? Can the individual find markets for those surplus products? Senators, it is not credits, it is markets that we need.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I must insist when a Senator has asked his question that he give me an opportunity to answer it. If the Senator from Louisiana will allow me to complete my statement as to section 1 of the amendment I have introduced and to make an explanation of it, I will now do so. Section 1 of the amendment is as far as I have gone. However, I will take up the Senator's question and answer it at the present time, if he insists on my doing so.

As I have heretofore said, in the South, and especially in the West, I am informed—I know it to be true in the West from personal knowledge and experience—the country banks have loaned and are going to be called on to loan to the farmers and to the cattlemen amounts of money largely in excess of what ordinarily heretofore has been loaned in the autumn, winter, and summer. In my own State I know during the last autumn and at the present time the loans of the country banks which were necessitated by the condition of the farmers far exceed what ought to exist according to the principles of good finance. I am told that the same condition exists in the South.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question.

Mr. BURSUM. In connection especially with loans to cattlemen, does the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota provide for an extension of individual loans?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; not of individual loans, but it provides aid, in addition to the credit which has already been extended, by a pool which is entirely outside of the corporation.

Mr. BURSUM. Of course, unless there is provision for making advances to individuals or firms, and taking the securities direct, there will be no appreciable relief to any of the banks.

Mr. KELLOGG. I discussed that with the War Finance Corporation, and they thought that they could cover all of the loans which were necessary for that purpose; but, of course, if the Senator thinks that any amendments should be made which will make the proposed legislation broader he may offer them. If the Senator, however, will allow me to proceed with my explanation I will now do so, for I hope to get through the discussion some time this afternoon.

It seemed to me that we needed something more in the present condition than simply loans to exporters or in aid of actual exportation; that we needed some agency which could in emergencies extend credit to certain banks and institutions and corporations and firms, which, like many of the cattle loan associations which the Senator from New Mexico has in mind, are loaded up with paper which they can not carry, and yet it is not subject to be rediscounted at the Federal reserve banks unless we throw open the doors, which it would be unwise to do. Therefore, as I have said, section 1 of the amendment proposes to extend credit to persons, firms, corporations, or associations who are engaged in dealing in these products before the products are exported.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has asked me a question to which he desires an immediate answer. I am willing to stop here and to do my best to answer the Senator's question. I have already stated that I do not believe it is a proper and safe province for any corporation organized under this Government to deal directly with and extend credit to foreign Governments and directly to foreign institutions. We should employ, we must employ, all the resources, the capital, the energy, and the enterprise of all of our domestic manufacturers, agencies, and firms, which are far more able to push our commerce than are foreign countries.

The Senator from Louisiana says we can not sell commodities now; that there is no market. Mr. President, I will place in the RECORD a statement which I believe to be accurate, but which I will not stop to read at length, which shows that in the fiscal year 1913-14 we exported about 167,000,000 bushels of wheat of a value of $157,000,000, while in the fiscal year 1920-21 we exported, in spite of the condition of Europe, 513,000,000 bushels of wheat, of which probably about 70,000,000 bushels were reexportations, of a value of $1,076,000,000; that of animal fats and meats we exported in 1913-14, 1,303,000,000 pounds, of a value of $145,000,000, while in 1920-21 we exported 2,202,000,000 pounds, of a value of $432,000,000.

I think cotton has suffered more than any other product, and to-day needs really more aid in order to push its exportation into foreign countries than any other single product. In 1913-14 we exported 9,000,000 bales—I am giving the round numbers—of a value of $610,000,000, while in 1920-21 we exported 5,000,000 bales, of a value of $600,000,000.

I will not give the figures as to tobacco and other articles, but I ask that the table be incorporated in my remarks, as it may be of some use to Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

	Fiscal year 1913-14.		Fiscal year 1920-21. <sup>1</sup>
	Quantity.	Value.	Quantity.	Value.
All grains.....	<sup>2</sup> 167,963,570	$157,747,541	<sup>2</sup> 513,707,887	<sup>2</sup> $1,076,475,000
Animal products and fats.....	<sup>3</sup> 1,303,267,164	145,684,753	<sup>3</sup> 2,202,531,000	432,500,000
Cotton.....	<sup>4</sup> 9,165,300	610,475,301	<sup>4</sup> 5,309,102	600,495,000

Of the above quantities (fiscal year 1921) approximately 390,000,000 bushels of grain, 4,515,000 bales of cotton, and 1,615,000,000 pounds of meats and fats were shipped to Europe.

Mr. KELLOGG. My information from the most careful investigation I have been able to make, although I may be mistaken, is that 85 per cent of our food products and 70 per cent of our cotton are sold to countries which readily financed themselves last year and in which better conditions of finance now obtain than was the case last year. I include in that list Great Britain, France, Belgium, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the principal countries of Europe, exclusive of Poland, Hungary, and Austria. Eighty-five per cent of our food products and our cotton goes to England, to France, and to other countries, which financed the largest purchases in their history last year, because it must be remembered that when the war was over restrictions on consumption were removed. The British Government does not need credit to buy food, cotton, and other exported articles. She does not expect it or ask it.

I do not mean by that that we do not need an agency to aid in financing our people who are selling to foreign merchants and manufacturers and the Governments that do buy, although I think now the Governments as such have ceased to buy and have turned over their purchases to individual merchants, manufacturers, and other agencies. In other words, the war restrictions on purchases and sales have practically been released in all of those countries.

Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana—and I should not have gone into this subject but for his question—that we have left Poland, Austria, Hungary, and Germany, which take about 15 per cent of our food products and about 30 per cent of our cotton. We all know that if the Reparations Commission will permit Germany to buy raw materials and food products and pay for them in advance before she pays the reparations, Germany is perfectly capable of buying all she needs. She bought over 1,000,000 bales of cotton last year and about 30,000,000 bushels of wheat.

If the Reparations Commission are not willing, we would be simply pouring money into their pockets if we gave the German Government credit. That is a question that has to solve itself. I believe that the Reparations Commission is going to permit Germany to buy the cotton and food products necessary to rehabilitate the German people, because you can not exterminate a nation, and I believe that the enlightened sentiment of Europe and of the world will permit Germany to finance her food supplies and her raw material supplies in order that she may support her people, and we must realize that if the Reparations Commission does not do it we can gain nothing by giving the German Government credit.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit just a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator that quite recently—indeed, within the past week—private interests have raised in the United States more than $40,000,000 for credits for Germany. In addition to that, I suggest to the Senator that within a very short time, probably, a German loan will be floated in the United States aggregating a great many millions of dollars. So Germany, notwithstanding the reparations exacted and the losses which she sustained as a result of the war, will, in my opinion, be able to finance herself and obtain such things as she requires which are compatible with the reparations requirements.

Mr. KELLOGG. I believe with the Senator from Louisiana that the War Finance Corporation, with its experience with German business and with other countries, will be very valuable in aiding in selling not only to German merchants and manufacturers but to all of the other countries in the East, and also to England, France, and Italy, because it has had a great deal of experience along this line.

Mr. President, when you take up the question, as I shall not undertake to do, and go into the details of Poland, Hungary, and Austria, I believe that Poland will produce within another year substantially all of her food supply, and she will need a large amount of cotton, and my best information is that she is getting it, and that the War Finance Corporation has cotton available for every manufacturer. Now, I do not believe we should stop there. We must aid in financing this cotton until it is ready for the market. We must aid in every country where it can be sold, and equally so with flour and wheat and the other products.

Senators, I do not minimize the necessity for maintaining a foreign commerce that swelled during the war beyond anything known in history in any nation. When we stop to think that our foreign commerce, by reason of the demands of the war, rose from three or four billion dollars to $12,000,000,000, out of which nearly $9,000,000,000 was exports, we realize that all the energies of our bankers, our manufacturers, our financial institutions, and the people of this country will be necessary to maintain that part of that commerce which will make prosperity among the farmers and the producers and the manufacturers of this country. I do not minimize it. If I thought the bill presented by the Agricultural Committee would better do that, I think I would waive my objections to the Government going into business, and I would be willing temporarily to go that far. I do not believe it will do it, however, for the reasons which I have stated; and I am sure that the chairman of the committee—who I wish were present—can not claim that the country I represent is not interested and its prosperity is not dependent upon the great agricultural interests.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. It may be unfortunate that I did not come into the Chamber in time to hear the first part of the Senator's statement; but, as I understand, the Senator proposes to extend credits to banks, individuals, and corporations. If the Senator will permit me to make a brief statement before asking the question I have in mind, the situation in my country is that the banks are loaded up on loans made, the security being agricultural products. The price of those products has fallen until now the security is not sufficient to cover the indebtedness. Is there any possibility of helping banks and other institutions in that situation?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator that I did explain that section 1 of this substitute is intended to relieve that identical thing.

Mr. CARAWAY. How will they furnish security to the War Finance Corporation?

Mr. KELLOGG. They are authorized to purchase, as the Senator will see from another section of the bill, paper and securities of local banks.

Mr. CARAWAY. But it must be solvent?

Mr. KELLOGG. Why, of course. Nobody is going to buy worthless stuff.

Mr. CARAWAY. The bill that we thought was going to help them would furnish them some means of selling this security, the cotton.

Mr. KELLOGG. It does.

Mr. CARAWAY. If you are merely going to loan money to a bank which has already loaned on cotton more money than it is worth, and do not furnish it any means of moving the cotton, I do not see how the bill will help it.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill authorizes the corporation to take off the hands of these local banks paper secured by warehouse receipts, by cotton, and by farm products, and to carry it, and makes them eligible with these securities at the Federal reserve banks, where they are not now eligible because many of these institutions that have loaned money are not members of the Federal reserve system. When the Senator comes to examine all the provisions of the bill, I think he will see that aid is extended as far as reasonable principles of finance will permit.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, the thing I had in mind—possibly I did not make it clear—was that we need some kind of an agency that will market the product. We have had all the credit we are entitled to under our security, and we want something to move the product. I do not see how a mere extension of credit would help us in that situation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, Mr. President, I will skip over some provisions of the substitute and just mention others.

I might mention that section 25 simply limits the obligations which this corporation may incur for these purposes to $1,000,000,000. That, in the opinion of the War Finance Corporation, is sufficient. If it is not, of course we can extend it, but it seemed to them that that is sufficient.

Section 26 extends the definition of the words "bank," "banker," or "trust company" to include reputable and responsible financial institutions with adequate resources. The purpose of this amendment is to clear up a doubt which has arisen whether certain institutions engaged in financing transactions of the character contemplated by the War Finance Corporation act, but not technically incorporated under banking laws, can qualify as borrowers from the Federal corporation; and I take it that that is a wise provision.

I might add that in all these advances, of course, the corporation is charged with obtaining full and adequate security, and thorough protection is thrown around its transactions. I do not believe there was ever a bill of the kind of the War Finance Corporation act that was more carefully drawn than the Finance Committee drew the original act, in which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] had a very honorable part. It threw around the corporation the protections that business and banking experience has indicated are necessary to good financing and to safe investments and safe business; and while those protections have been changed and liberalized, and in one case the rate of interest at which the corporation can loan has been reduced, in a general way those protections have been preserved in the bill and in the amendment.

Section 24 is designed to permit the corporation to deal with an acute situation existing in the case of many small banks in agricultural districts. Many of these banks are ineligible for membership in the Federal reserve system, and have no adequate rediscounting facilities at their disposal. The amendment authorizes the corporation to make advances to these banks against their promissory notes or other direct obligations, adequately secured, to reimburse them for advances made for agricultural purposes, including live stock. The corporation is further authorized in exceptional cases to purchase from banks, bankers, or trust companies paper secured by agricultural products, including live stock. The purpose of this authorization is to enable the corporation to deal with a situation which frequently arises where a bank in an agricultural district may have reached the limit of its borrowing power as conferred by its charter or the State law, and hence can not borrow from the War Finance Corporation.

The bank may nevertheless hold sound and adequately secured agricultural paper. The amendment will authorize the War Finance Corporation, as an emergency measure, to relieve the bank of such paper, thus putting it in funds and extending its borrowing power accordingly.

Mr. President, of course it is impossible for anyone to describe adequately to what extent this power will be exercised; but we know that in many of the agricultural districts of the country, in the cattle country, in the cotton country, and in the grain countries, many of the local banks and banking concerns who are not even members of the Federal reserve system are loaded up with paper, much of which is good and most of which is good, but which is not available for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks, and their correspondent banks in the larger cities are carrying them to the limit of their capacity. The actual loans probably will not be as great as the effect of the knowledge that here is an institution with half a million dollars of capital, and which may borrow a billion more on good credit, which stands ready to aid the banking and financial institutions of the country which are loaded up with this paper.

Why, we know that within the past few months $50,000,000 was raised by a pool and put in the hands of certain gentlemen to finance the cattle raisers, and I know that last autumn many cattle-loan companies which had loaned money and made a regular business of loaning money to farmers to carry their cattle until they were ready for market lost every dollar of their capital, and many of them had to make assessments and raise money in that way, and were not in position to extend any more credit or the kind of credit which was necessary in the cattle business.

So a pool was made up of $50,000,000. This corporation is authorized to aid local institutions and banks, as well as exporters, in relieving that particular situation, and I believe will be of great assistance. I would not ordinarily think it wise for the Government even to go that far, but I am willing and anxious to go to most any extent within the bounds of what I consider to be safe finance to relieve this situation for the farmers.

I have no doubt that this War Finance Corporation will be able to do some such thing as it has already done. It has sold to the merchants and manufacturers of Czechoslovakia a large consignment of cotton, and took the mills' paper, guaranteed by certain banks and by the Government of Czechoslovakia. The local bank or exporter turned the paper over to the War Finance Corporation, and the War Finance Corporation has used millions and millions of dollars in the aid of exports, but has never lost a penny for the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, it is perfectly easy, of course, if we want to vote an appropriation, to organize a Government company to buy all the products in the country; but we would have to sell them, and there are certain principles of world finance which can not be violated without disaster to ourselves. If this will not accomplish the desired result, I will help in getting through any bill, within what I believe to be reasonably sound finance, to do it, and my only object in taking the time of the Senate this morning is to explain, as far as I am able to, my investigations of this subject.

Now, if I may pass to one or two other sections, I will be through. Section 27 first makes it possible to secure the assistance of the Comptroller of the Currency in obtaining information regarding all banks. It also reenacts section 12 of the War Finance Corporation law, with certain amendments. Instead of issuing bonds alone, it authorizes notes and bonds, which may be issued, of course, in serial numbers, or on short time, so that it will not be compelled to sell long-time bonds, running a year, or even six months, if it can obtain temporary credit in the sale of notes or short-time bonds. The amount of bonds this corporation is authorized to issue is reduced from $3,000,000,000, which we authorized during the war, to $1,000,000,000. Maybe that is not sufficient. The Congress can increase it if it is not. It is the opinion of Mr. Meyer, of the War Finance Corporation, in whom I have great confidence, that $1,000,000,000 is all that is necessary, in addition to its capital, which is $500,000,000. It seemed to us and to him wise that the unlimited power to issue bonds, which is a great power, and which I voted for with great hesitation, should be cut down to somewhere near the limit of the necessities of the case.

Mr. POMERENE. What rate of interest is provided for?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is left to the War Finance Corporation, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. POMERENE. Without any limit whatsoever?

Mr. KELLOGG. As to the rate of interest?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. There has been no limit in the past, except this, as I will show: In certain advances it must not be less than 1 per cent more than the standard rate of the Federal reserve banks, because it would not do for this corporation to interfere with the flow of all the credit that the Federal reserve banks may give. The rate of interest so far paid on the $200,000,000 they issued, I am informed by one of the officers of the corporation, was 5 per cent, less a small discount in the sales price of three-eighths of 1 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. If there was not some limit made, we would be in about the same position the War and the Navy Departments were in during the war when they were bidding against each other.

Mr. KELLOGG. As far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing to leave it to the Senate to impose any limitation it thinks should be put on it.

As to these bonds, of course, they are not guaranteed by the Government. Among many Senators and public men I know there now seems to be a great objection to the Government issuing any more bonds, which necessarily come in competition with the Liberty loan bonds and the Victory loan bonds, which the people of this country purchased at par and which they are now holding to the extent of nearly $20,000,000,000; because the Government, if it sold a direct loan of its own, could not sell it at the rate of interest which the bonds we sold during the war carried. But the War Finance Corporation does not issue and sell a Government bond backed by a Government guaranty. The bond is a first charge on all its assets, and it has a capital of $500,000,000 back of the bonds. The bonds, to be sure, are exempt from normal taxes only. They are subject to the inheritance tax and to the surtaxes.

I object very seriously, of course, to the Government issuing any very large amount of bonds that are tax exempt. I think it would be better for the country if neither State, Federal Government, nor any agency could issue a tax-exempt bond. But we are facing a condition which exists, and not an ideal theory of government. The Senator from Nebraska was confronted with the same problem, and he followed the War Finance Corporation.

The bonds that this corporation has issued have been readily salable, were paid off within the year, and I am informed that the managers believe they will have no difficulty in raising the amount of money necessary to aid the commerce of the country. If they should, of course, we can easily extend the limit; but there ought to be a limit, and $3,000,000,000 is too great a limit for times of peace. We do not need any such amount.

The last paragraph to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate has been submitted to the Federal Reserve Board and has been considered with great care. I would like to read it:

That the Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the maturity limitations of the Federal reserve act and to regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to discount the direct obligations of member banks secured by such notes or bonds of the corporation, and to rediscount notes or other negotiable instruments secured by such notes or bonds and indorsed by a member bank. Discounts or rediscounts under this section shall be at an interest rate equal to the prevailing rate for eligible commercial paper of corresponding maturities.

I will say to Senators that I am aware that the claim may be made that this may cause some expansion, but I believe under the management of a board of directors of the character and standing of that of this corporation it will not and can not be seriously abused. The principal difference between the law as it is now and the pending bill is that under subdivision 4, as proposed, the rediscount of paper secured by War Finance Corporation bonds is authorized at the 90-day commercial discount rate, instead of 1 per cent more, as required by the original War Finance Corporation act. In other words, it seemed to the War Finance Corporation, and it seems to me, and I think it will appeal to other Senators, that under these circumstances, where this paper becomes eligible for rediscount it ought not to be charged 1 per cent more than is charged on the rediscount of other paper. I am quite aware that during the war this clause was put in there to prevent an undue expansion of rediscounts.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator indicate where the language of the amendment suggests a difference in the rate of interest?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I refer the Senator to section 13 of the original War Finance Corporation act, which contains the following language:

No discount or rediscount under this section shall be granted at a less interest charge than 1 per cent per annum above the prevailing rates for eligible commercial paper of corresponding maturity.

That is taken out.

Mr. McCORMICK. The provision regarding the additional 1 per cent is taken out?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; that is taken out.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, while the Senator is on this question of the modification of the present War Finance Corporation act, I notice that in the proposed amendment to section 12, as I understood the substitute when it was read, the substitute proposes to change section 12 where it says:

That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time its bonds in an amount aggregating not more than six times its paid-in capital.

Under the Senator's amendment that would be reduced to two times?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I explained that in passing.

Mr. SMITH. I was not in the Chamber when the explanation was made.

Mr. KELLOGG. Under the original War Finance Corporation act we authorized the corporation to issue bonds to the extent of six times its capital. Of course, that was in time of war, and no one knew to what extent the credit of this corporation might be demanded. As I understand it, it is the opinion of the officers of the War Finance Corporation that they will not need over $1,000,000,000. In fact, they have issued but $200,000,000 of bonds and have met all the demands upon them which it seemed wise to meet. If, of course, $1,000,000,000 is not enough, the Congress can readily give further authority.

Mr. SMITH. The only point I wanted to make was that the granting of this authorization and their failure to use it is hardly an argument that would appeal, because, as the Senator has just stated, in case they needed more than the $1,000,000,000 it would necessitate their coming back to Congress. Of course, it is hardly a point worth considering, but it seems significant that in an emergency as great as that with which we are now confronted the probabilities are that we may need more credit than we have ever needed before along the line proposed by this modification.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator that personally I have not the slightest objection to its being made $1,500,000,000 or any other sum which the Senate thinks may be needed in this emergency and in the next year or two. I have confidence in the officers of this corporation and the Secretary of the Treasury that that power will not be abused, and I have not the slightest objection to its being made $2,000,000,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator in his substitute increase the capital?

Mr. KELLOGG. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. My information is that the chairman of the War Finance Corporation thought that instead of the proposed capital of $1,500,000,000 the already existing capital of $500,000,000 would be sufficient, and the reason why he did not want the bill to provide for more was because he feared, and I think very justly feared, that the larger amount might interfere with the sale of the bonds of the corporation. In other words, he thought a corporation with a paid-in capital of $500,000,000 could sell its bonds much more readily if it was only authorized to issue twice the amount of its paid-in capital than it could if it was authorized to issue bonds to six times the amount of its paid-in capital.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator is quite correct. In the discussion I had quite forgotten that point. It is quite true that Mr. Meyer was of the opinion that $500,000,000 would be more than he could use, turning it over as he does, in all the export transactions which would come to the Finance Corporation.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President—

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator know how much available capital the War Finance Corporation now has?

Mr. KELLOGG. I stated that it had on hand upward of $400,000,000, probably from $400,000,000 to $430,000,000 available to use immediately in this work.

Mr. McLEAN. So it will call for no additional contribution from the Treasury?

Mr. KELLOGG. It will call for no appropriation whatever from the Treasury, and I am assured by the gentlemen in charge of the War Finance Corporation that they believe that their credit is such that they will have no difficulty in borrowing such sums of money at reasonable rates of interest as they may need to finance all of the export business and domestic business which it is legitimate for that corporation to carry on.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to add to what I just said that, of course, this is to be a revolving fund—

Mr. KELLOGG. That is quite true.

Mr. SIMMONS. If at any time the corporation should have loaned out to the full extent of its $1,500,000,000 resources it would, of course, have on hand a very large amount of perfectly liquid and solvent securities, and it could sell as many of those securities as might be necessary to enable it to go on conducting the business provided for.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as I understand the law, if the Senator will allow me, under the War Finance Corporation act they are not allowed to sell any securities that they may have except their bonds. They can sell the bonds, but they are not allowed to sell any of the securities which they hold.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; Mr. President, the Senator is entirely mistaken. They have sold a lot of Liberty bonds. They can sell any security which they may buy.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is there any provision in the proposed amendment which the Senator from Minnesota has submitted forbidding the War Finance Corporation to sell its assets or any part thereof?

Mr. KELLOGG. The War Finance Corporation may, of course, realize on its loans, but it can not liquidate its capital stock. If it realizes on its loans, it has the money in the place of the loan. It is prohibited from mortgaging its assets by the law, because as the Government is not back of its bonds, there must be some reasonable security. At the time the War Finance Corporation issued its bonds they were readily taken by the public, and the War Finance Corporation now has good credit standing among banking institutions and investors, which the Senator knows is largely a matter of growth and confidence.

Mr. President, I have taken much more of the time of the Senate than I intended in this discussion of the provisions of the bill and in conclusion I merely desire to say—

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question before he concludes?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Is there anything in the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota that in any way modifies or amends section 17 of the War Finance Corporation act? That is the section, the Senator will recall, which provides that the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bonds or other obligations.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; that is not amended in any way. I stated before that the War Finance Corporation bonds were secured simply by the assets of the corporation, which of course amount to $500,000,000. The Government owns the stock and no further appropriation or guaranty is involved.

Mr. McLEAN. May I ask just what is the character of securities held by the War Finance Corporation? Do they hold any foreign securities?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not able to say just what they hold at this time. They have held the securities of local exporters secured by notes of foreign manufacturers, banks, and Governments, but the corporation has the direct obligation of the domestic exporter or manufacturer or bank.

Mr. McLEAN. They probably have the guaranty of some domestic institution?

Mr. KELLOGG. They must have, under the present act, the direct obligation of a domestic corporation or institution. In one instance with which I was familiar, as I said before, the War Finance Corporation took a large amount of the obligations of cotton exporters and as security received the notes of the leading cotton mills in Czechoslovakia, of the banks, and, thirdly, the guaranty of the Government. The American concerns turned them over, and they were carried by the War Finance Corporation. I might explain in passing that the extent of the credit under section 22 is one year, but may be extended for two years more. No bond can be issued after January 1, 1927, and all bonds must be repaid by July 1, 1927.

All that I have done in this matter and in the investigation I have made has been since the bill was reported to the Senate. I assure the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the Senate that my sole object was to do everything that could be done, which I believe should be done, in a safe business way, consistent with our institutions and our finances, to relieve the exporter and the farmer, not only in carrying the products, but in marketing them in foreign countries.

I have believed and now believe that the War Finance Corporation is one of the best agencies, the safest and the most effectual agency, that we created during the war, and it has been one of the best managed. I believe that its assistance in this crucial financial period in this country will not be confined to the money it advances in particular cases, but that its assistance and its aid to the exporters, banks, and business men of the country with resources of $1,500,000,000 behind it, well managed, will be of far-reaching benefit to our commerce and to our domestic institutions in this time of great financial stress.

Mr. McLEAN. I think the War Finance Corporation has a profit of something like $40,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not able to say as to that. As I believe I have said before, it now has supplies of cotton in nearly every country of the world ready to be sold, it has its agencies in foreign countries, pushing our commerce, and I believe anything that we may do to strengthen it will be of great benefit to the local producer, to the farmer, and the local banker in the country.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask him one question. I would have asked it earlier, but did not care to break the continuity of the Senator's explanation.

The difference between the present War Finance Corporation act and the amendment proposed by the Senator is that under the Senator's amendment it is proposed, in view of the fact that the foreign markets are not in a position to absorb the products of this country, that the scope of the War Finance Corporation shall be now enlarged so it may go to the assistance of the local banks, the little banks in the agricultural communities which have accepted paper on farm products to their limit under the laws governing them. This corporation takes up that paper and thereby relieves those who must have some means of carrying on their farm work and realize enough to meet their more pressing obligations; and this corporation will now take that paper and liquidate it for those banks, and in lieu of exporting it will hold the stuff from the market until such time as there is an export market. Is not that in a word the difference between the present law and the one proposed by the Senator?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say in answer to the Senator that it is partly that. This corporation, of course, does not buy and hold any products. It can make advances not only to persons, corporations, firms, and banks in aid of carrying products for domestic concerns, but in aid of selling them in foreign countries as well. I have tried to explain as well as I could the provisions in that regard. The bill offered by the committee authorizes a new corporation, requiring an appropriation of $100,000,000, to issue Government-guaranteed bonds to the extent of $1,000,000,000 and to buy and sell farm products. I believe that provision to be unwise.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to close, because I have used altogether too much time.

I submit these remarks not with any view that the amendment is perfect or that there may not be other amendments which would accomplish the same object, but the careful study I have given to the bill in the last week or 10 days leads me to believe that if we are going to accomplish any real benefit to the farmer and the producer of this country we should pursue this course rather than to organize a corporation to buy and sell products and launch into new fields which, based on similar experiments, will undoubtedly prove most disastrous.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before he takes his seat will the Senator allow me to propound a question?

The Senator says that he has given a great deal of study to this question since the consideration of the so-called Norris bill began in the Senate. We all know the Senator is a close student of such matters. Does the amendment represent the views of the administration on this question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I can not say as to that.

Mr. HARRISON. The reason I ask the Senator the question is that the newspapers have printed the news that the President would send a message to the Senate this morning in reference to this legislation, and that the administration was preparing a bill on the subject. I suppose, of course, if this is the administration bill, it would carry more weight than the weight that would be carried by a bill which was merely the work of the Senator introducing it and it represented merely his individual views.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I stated frankly this morning, I have never discussed the details of the amendment with the President, though I have discussed its details with the members of the War Finance Corporation, and I am told the measure has been discussed with the Secretary of the Treasury, though I have not discussed it with him.

Mr. HARRISON. Does this measure meet their approval?

Mr. KELLOGG. So far as I am able to say, it is believed by the Treasury Department and the Comptroller of the Currency and the War Finance Corporation that the amendment will accomplish much more than the bill of the Senator from Nebraska, and embodies all that it is safe for the Government to launch upon.

Mr. HARRISON. And they prefer the Senator's substitute to the Norris bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. I said in opening my remarks that the principal features of the amendment had been considered with care, and had been discussed by various Senators with the War Finance Corporation. I want the Senator from Mississippi to know all there is about it, for there is no mystery in reference to the matter. I believe that Mr. Meyer and his associate directors have had a great deal of experience, and I believe that their advice is very valuable. I for one do not pretend to be competent to pass upon all the provisions of the proposed substitute, but I have frankly given the Senator from Mississippi all the information I have.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota thoroughly, but I merely wished to be informed in reference to the status of his amendment.

Mr. RANDELL and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield the floor.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

During the delivery of Mr. KELLOGG's speech, Mr. BALL. Mr. President, my colleague, Mr. DU PONT, whose credentials have heretofore been presented and placed on file, is present and ready to take the oath of office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The newly appointed Senator from Delaware will present himself at the desk for that purpose.

Mr. DU PONT was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. BALL, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

After the conclusion of Mr. KELLOGG's speech,

OBLIGATIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT TO THE RAILROADS (S. DOC. NO. 54).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Newberry	Smoot
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Spencer
Brandagee	Kellogg	Norbeck	Stanfield
Broussard	Kendrick	Norris	Stanley
Capper	Kenyon	Oddie	Sterling
Caraway	King	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	Ladd	Phipps	Trammell
Dial	La Follette	Pittman	Underwood
Edge	Lenroot	Poinexter	Wadsworth
Ernst	McCormick	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	McKellar	Ransdell	Warren
Fletcher	McKinley	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	McLean	Robinson	Watson, Ind.
Gooding	McNary	Sheppard	Williams
Harris	Moses	Shortridge	Willis
Harrison	Nelson	Simmons
Heflin	New	Smith

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Secretary will read the message from the President.

The reading clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It is necessary to call the attention of Congress to the obligations of the Government to the railroads and ask your cooperation in order to enable the Government to discharge these obligations. There is nothing new about them, but only recently has there come an understanding which seems well to justify a sincere endeavor to effect an early settlement. These obligations already have been recognized by the Congress in the passage of the transportation act restoring the railroads to their owners, but previous recognition was made in the contract under which the railroads were operated by the Government for the period of the World War.

The contract covering operation provided that the railways should be returned to their owners in as good condition as when taken over by the Government, and the transportation act, recognizing that betterments and additions belong to capital account, provided that such sums as the railway companies owed the Government for betterments and new equipment, added during the period of Government operation, might be funded. There has been at no time any question about the justice of funding such indebtedness to the Government. Indeed, it has been in progress to a measurable degree ever since the return of the railroads to their owners. It has been limited, however, to such cases as those in which final settlements with the railway administration have been effected. The process is admittedly too slow to meet the difficult situation which the owners of the railroads have been facing, and I believe it essential to restore railway activities and essential to the country's good fortune to hasten both funding and settlement.

Quite apart from the large sums owing to the Government, which we are morally and legally bound to fund, the Government admittedly owes the railway companies large sums on various accounts, such as compensation, depreciation, and maintenance. There has been a wide difference of opinion relating to the amount the Government owes, due in the main to the claim of the owners that in spite of materials and hours of labor being estimated in proper relations to similar expenditure in the prewar test period, the "inefficiency of labor" still left a wide difference between actual upkeep and the expenditure made during the Government operation.

In order to expedite settlement and funding an informal understanding, which is all that is possible or practical, has been reached, under which the railway claims based on the "inefficiency of labor" are to be waived to hasten complete and final settlements, without surrender of any rights in court in case there is failure to settle. I have no doubt that early, final, and satisfactory settlements will be reached, since the policy of the railway administration already has been effective in finally settling the accounts of roads filing claims amounting to $225,568,764, resulting in the payment to them of $68,141,222.

The way now would seem to be clear to very early adjustment and relief, except for the fact that the railway administration, though possessing assets, does not command the funds necessary to meet what will be its admitted obligations.

There is no thought to ask Congress for additional funds. Perhaps $500,000,000 will be necessary. The Railroad Administration has, or will have in the progress of funding, ample securities to meet all requirements if Congress only will grant the authority to negotiate these securities and provide the agency for their negotiation.

With this end in view, you are asked to extend the authority of the War Finance Corporation so that it may purchase these railway funding securities accepted by the Director General of Railroads. No added expense, no added investment is required on the part of the Government; there is no added liability, no added tax burden. It is merely the grant of authority necessary to enable a most useful and efficient Government agency to use its available funds to purchase securities for which Congress already has authorized the issue and turn them into the channels of finance ready to float them.

I can readily believe that so simple a remedy will have your prompt sanction. The question of our obligation can not be raised, the wisdom of affording early relief is not to be doubted, and the avoidance of added appropriation or liability will appeal to Congress and the public alike.

The after-war distresses of two great and fundamental activities have been riveting the anxious attention of the country. One is the readjustment and restoration of agriculture, the other is the distress of our railway transportation system.

Pending proposals for relief and their discussion have already brought to the attention of Congress the very promising possibilities of broadening the powers of the War Finance Corporation for the further relief of agriculture and live-stock production. This corporation has proven itself so helpful in the relief thus far undertaken that I can not help but believe that its broadened powers, as have been proposed, to meet agricultural needs will enable it wholly to meet the nation-wide emergency. This is an impelling moral obligation to American farming in all its larger aspects, and it will be most gratifying to have your early sanction.

In the case of the railroads there is a moral and a contractual obligation, and your favorable action is no less urgent and will no less appeal to public approval. Railway solvency and efficiency are essential to our healthful industrial, commercial, and agricultural life. Everything hinges on transportation.

After necessary and drastic curtailments, after harrowing straits in meeting their financial difficulties, the railways need only this financial aid which the fulfillment of our obligations will bestow to inaugurate their far-reaching revival. Its effects will be felt in varied industries and will banish to a large degree the depression which, though inevitable in war's aftermath, we are all so anxious to see ended.

I am appending herewith memoranda concerning the progress of railroad liquidation and revealing existing conditions which Congress will be interested to note, while considering the simple remedy proposed for the relief of the situation. The information is submitted by the Director General of the Railroads.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 26, 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message will be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted by the Lovell Commercial Club, of Lovell, Wyo., protesting against the enactment of Senate bill 1355, to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a post roads and interstate highway system, to create a Federal Highway Commission, and for other purposes, unless the bill shall be amended so as to provide for the continued administration of roads and trails within the national forests by the Department of Agriculture with necessary appropriations therefor, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the American Federation of Labor at its recent convention in Denver, Colo., favoring the enactment of an adequate import tariff on crude oil and its by-products so as to protect the independent petroleum and coal-producing interests operating in the United States, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of Deaconess Hospital, of Cincinnati, Ohio, protesting against any proposed increase in the tariff on surgical instruments, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I present resolutions adopted at a meeting of the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion, held in Washington, D. C., July 24, 1921, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS PRIVATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Washington, D. C., July 24, 1921.

At a meeting of the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers and Sailors' Legion, held at the national headquarters, 810 F Street NW., Washington, D. C., on July 24, 1921, there were adopted by unanimous vote the following resolutions:

Resolved by the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers and Sailors' Legion, on behalf of all our members, men who know from personal experience what war really means, That we do hereby most heartily congratulate Warren G. Harding, President of the United States, on his wise and humane action in inviting the great nations of the earth to a disarmament conference at Washington; and

Resolved, That we feel that the action of President Harding in taking the lead in this movement to relieve our people and the peoples of all nations from the crushing burden of military armaments and preparations for war will in its far-reaching results for the good of humanity rank as one of the wisest and most beneficent acts of any President since the foundation of this Republic; and

Resolved, That we extend to President Harding our heartfelt thanks, our earnest support, and our warmest good wishes for complete success in his efforts for disarmament and the relief it will bring to suffering humanity, and for the advancement of peace and prosperity for our own country and all the nations of the earth which will flow from this great movement.

[SEAL.]

MARVIN GATES SPERRY,
Chairman National Executive Committee,
The Private Soldiers and Sailors' Legion.
EARL L. SEAL, Secretary.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 234) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 2304) granting a pension to Bertha Greaves (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 2305) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Charles C. Adams; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2306) to authorize the Secretary of War to release a certain right of way no longer needed for military purposes at Springfield Armory, Mass.; and

A bill (S. 2307) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 2308) granting an increase of pension to Sallie Blevins (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. EDGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 163) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Eighty-eighth Division Association for their reunion at Des Moines, Iowa, tents, cots, mattresses, blankets, and galvanized-iron buckets was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, as a member of the Agricultural Committee and a Senator from a State intensely interested in agriculture, I am delighted to see that our President and his advisers are taking a deep and a most intelligent interest in trying to devise legislation to assist in the difficult agricultural situation which now confronts the Nation.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had the Norris $100,000,000 export corporation bill under consideration for several weeks. We took the advice of everyone who was willing to appear and assist us, and the result of our efforts was the preparation and favorable report of this bill. It has been considered in the Senate about 10 days, and has aroused unusual public interest. The efforts of the committee and the Senate debates have, I am sure, convinced the country that the situation of agriculture is very serious, and something should be done to afford immediate relief.

Why is the situation serious? It is because there is a vast surplus of agricultural products on hand, because there is a growing crop, and in a few months a large additional amount of these products will come on the market. The evidence before the committee shows that in the single State of Iowa there are about 250,000,000 bushels of corn on hand. Now, corn does not keep indefinitely. That corn is going to be destroyed after a while. There are large quantities of corn in the other great grain States, especially Nebraska and Illinois. There is little or no demand for that corn. The average price to the farmer for corn in those three States at the present time is about 34 cents per bushel at the elevator, and we were told that it costs 14 cents a bushel to haul, husk, and sack it, leaving the farmer for the rent of his land and for all his labor in connection with the production of that corn the miserable pittance of 20 cents per bushel. The quotations on the eastern markets are considerably higher than the 34 cents at the elevators of Iowa, Illinois, and Nebraska, but, sirs, the railroads receive an average of 60 cents per 100 pounds for transporting corn from those States to the Atlantic seaboard, or an average of about 36 cents per bushel. So at the present prices, if the corn could be transported and sold at the seaboard the railroads would get a great deal more out of it than the producers.

Mr. President and Senators, from the best evidence before your Committee on Agriculture and Forestry there is a considerable surplus in our country of every agricultural product except wheat. There are on hand vast quantities of cotton, rice, hides, barley, oats, meatstuffs—not live cattle, I am sorry to say—great quantities of every kind of agricultural products except wheat, and a good crop in the ground, a good crop being produced. What are we to do with this surplus and with the increasing surplus? Echo answers, "What?" Is it not the duty of the Senate to try to devise some means to assist the farmers in disposing of their products?

How do we happen to have such a surplus? Who is responsible for the largely increased production of agricultural products of every kind and sort? Did not our great Government, through the Agricultural Department and the Food Administration, cry out from every housetop to the farmers of America, "Produce! Produce! Produce! Increase your production! The world needs every pound of cotton and every pound of food that you can produce, and all that you can produce for several years to come?"

Who was more active in that cry for increased production than the gentleman now at the head of our Department of Commerce, Mr. Hoover? He was honest in his efforts. We applauded his efforts. We followed his advice, and we have a very great surplus of agricultural products on hand.

I submit, Mr. President and Senators, that as the Government through its authorized agents insisted upon this increased production, it is at least morally bound to assist the farmers in getting rid of this surplus product. No one can deny that proposition, and it is certainly a most important national matter.

The farmers of America constitute about 48 per cent of all of our people. The farmers' wealth is estimated at $77,000,000,000. Now, "seventy-seven billions" rolls glibly off the tongue; but when you compare that sum with the railroad valuation of twenty billions, and reflect that the farmers of this country are worth in round numbers four times as much as all the railroads, it calls for serious consideration and very careful attention to anything which the farmers ask for. Fifty per cent, in round numbers, of our population, seventy-seven billions of our wealth! Why, we have just heard read a message from the President in regard to the railroads.

I understand that we are going to be called upon to give them $500,000,000. Probably we shall have to do it. I have always voted for everything that they seemed absolutely to require. I realize that we can not live without the great transportation system of this country; but, sirs, when we are called upon to give the railroads five hundred millions, let me remind you that the Norris bill calls for only one hundred millions for the farmers of America, whose aggregate wealth is four times as much as that of the railroads. The railroads are to be given five hundred millions and the farmers one hundred millions. If you were to put the farmers on a parity with the railroads you would have to give them at this time two billions instead of one hundred millions, twenty times as much as the Norris bill proposes. Those things require thoughtful consideration, Senators.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. Can the Senator give us any idea of the total value of the surplus agricultural products that now are pressing for market?

Mr. RANSDELL. It would be impossible, Mr. President and Senators, to answer that question. It is certainly very large. A conservative estimate is $1,000,000,000, and I believe one and a half billion is nearer correct. A number of Senators from the South have been trying very hard to get a careful census made of the cotton now on hand. The best evidence I have been able to obtain in regard to cotton indicates on hand on the 1st of next month about 6,750,000 bales. I saw a wild statement in the paper yesterday—you probably read it—that some department of the Government was going to declare that we had about 10,500,000 bales of cotton on hand.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. RANSDELL. I am satisfied that that is entirely incorrect. I examined the question with great care a short while ago, when I wanted to make an address in New York before the American Cotton Congress; and from the best evidence then obtainable, counting the balance of carry over, as it is called, on the 1st of August of last year, calculating the total production of cotton during the year 1920-21, as we describe it, and deducting the actual exportation from that time to the present and the actual consumption from that date to the 1st of next month, I made out about 6,750,000 bales of cotton. Now, the Senator knows about what that is worth as well as I do.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator will excuse me just one moment, then I will yield. If you were to sell it at the present time, I doubt if you could get over 7 or 8 cents per pound for it. At 8 cents per pound it would be $40 per bale, so you can make your own calculation.

I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I interrupt the Senator to inform him that I have just received a statement from the Director of the Census to-day, and the amount of cotton on hand on July 31, as indicated by the Bureau of the Census, will be 6,139,000 bales.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator very much. I was just going to say, when interrupted by him, that I had to make an estimate of the foreign exports of cotton for three months when I made that speech. I have not looked at the figures since, and the exports, I am glad to say, have been larger, in proportion, than I estimated. It has been moving a little more freely to the Old World than we had hoped.

Mr. McLEAN. The exports of cotton were about double in June of this year what they were last year?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am not sure.

Mr. McLEAN. What would be the normal hold over of cotton?

Mr. RANSDELL. I could not give the Senator a satisfactory answer to that; there is a big difference of opinion. About 8 or 10 years ago, if I recall the figures, there was a hold over of around 5,000,000 bales. I should say the normal hold over is between three and four million bales. But 6,000,000 bales is a great deal more than the normal; 6,750,000 bales is nearly 3,000,000 bales above the normal.

Mr. McLEAN. My information is that the normal hold over would be nearly 5,000,000 bales, which is 1,000,000 bales larger than the Senator from Louisiana thinks would be the yearly hold over. But even at 4,000,000 bales, taking into consideration the fact that the next crop probably will be 4,000,000 bales short—

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope so, Senator. The acreage is very much reduced. The area in cotton is reduced about 11,000,000 acres—from something like 37,043,000 in 1920 to 26,519,000 this year. In other words, the reduction in acreage is very nearly 30 per cent, and that normally would indicate a reduction of about 4,000,000 bales, from a normal crop of about 12,000,000 bales.

Mr. McLEAN. The prospect is for a very short cotton crop. Adding the hold over to the current crop, you will have next January less cotton by two or three million bales than you would ordinarily have.

Mr. RANDELL. I wish I could think so. About the most bullish estimate—for that is the term we use—is something over 8,000,000 bales for the present crop. You would add to the 8,000,000 the 6,200,000 carry over, as indicated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and that would make well over 14,000,000 on the 1st of January.

Mr. McLEAN. There is not an extraordinary and unusual surplus of cotton at the present time, according to the Senator's own estimate.

Mr. RANDELL. It is not extraordinary, if we could get at the facts. If the Senator from Alabama has been furnished a statement of the real facts as to the carry over being 6,139,000 bales, and the crop is not more than 8,500,000 bales, the carry over will not be very troublesome, I will say to the Senator; we will be able to handle it. But there are several "ifs" intervening.

The first is, is that estimate of the Census Bureau correct? The second is, will the crop be only about 8,500,000 bales? The boll weevil is said to be very bad at the present time. There has been entirely too much rain in many sections of the belt and too much drouth in others. The cotton crop is not in a very promising condition. But I have seen things change wonderfully from the 1st of August, and a crop that was not promising on the 1st of August turned out remarkably well in October and November, when it was gathered.

Mr. McLEAN. At present prices the Senator would not expect any difficulty in financing the cotton crop this year? It would not take more than one-half of the capital ordinarily used to finance the cotton crop—to handle it this year?

Mr. RANDELL. I will say to the Senator that the price is considerably below the prewar price, and if cotton is going to remain at anything like its average present price it certainly would not take a great deal of money to finance it.

Mr. McLEAN. The banks probably would be able to finance it at its present price?

Mr. RANDELL. I beg the Senator's pardon—

Mr. McLEAN. What the Senator wants is a higher price for the cotton?

Mr. RANDELL. I would like very much to have higher prices, but I do not wish to have the farmers hold the cotton abnormally. I want the cotton to move. I will say to the Senator that even though cotton will last indefinitely if it is properly housed in a perfectly dry warehouse, much of it, I am sorry to say, is not so housed. Much of it is on the farms, under barns, under the edges of galleries, and is deteriorating rapidly. It ought to be sold, beyond any question, and there is a considerable surplus on hand right now.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, there is a surplus of cotton, but cotton is an indestructible product, almost, if properly housed.

Mr. RANDELL. If properly housed, yes; but, unfortunately, a great deal of it is not properly housed.

Mr. McLEAN. I fancy that what the southern cotton grower really wants is not the money to carry his crop against an uncertain market, but a present sale at a profit, if he can get it.

Mr. RANDELL. I think the Senator has expressed that very nicely, a present sale at a profit; but how can he get a present sale at a profit, when his cotton cost him over 30 cents, and he can not hope to have it go up as high as that?

Mr. McLEAN. That is the problem we are facing here. The question is, What can the Government do in the premises, and what ought the Government do in the premises?

Mr. RANDELL. This substitute, I will say, proposes to lend the southern farmer money with which to hold his cotton; to hold it maybe two or three or four or five years. The Norris bill proposes to create a corporation that will try to find immediate buyers for the cotton abroad—people who will take the surplus of two or three million bales off the growers' hands, give them money, and let them close their books. The grower knows he is in for a very heavy loss in any event, but he would like to close his books and see just where he stands, not borrow a large amount of money, and carry on indefinitely.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. RANDELL. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. At the risk of asking the Senator to elaborate, I wish he would explain, if he will, how the corporation provided for in the Norris bill would find a market abroad. Under what provision of the Norris bill does the Senator think that market could be found?

Mr. RANDELL. Under the provision which authorizes this corporation of three persons to sell exports to foreign countries.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator means he would have the corporation buy the cotton and sell it abroad?

Mr. RANDELL. That was provided in the bill as originally drawn, I will say to the Senator, but I think that feature of it is going to be changed. I do not disclose any secret when I say that the committee this morning agreed to amend that phase of it somewhat, and to have the corporation act as agent for the owners of goods in this country in finding the purchasers abroad and selling the goods to them, taking the very best securities we can get, Government guaranties if possible—and we are assured we can get Government guaranties in many instances—and then using those securities and guaranties as the basis for an issue of bonds.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the Senator, further, under what provision of the Norris bill can credits be established in Europe more easily than under the provisions of the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. RANDELL. Under the terms of the Norris bill, if the Senator will look at section 9, he will find it is provided that the corporation is authorized—to act as agent of any person producing or dealing in such agricultural products within the United States; and (3) to make advances for the purpose of assisting in financing the exportation of agricultural products upon such terms and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation to any person producing such products within the United States.

Now, listen to this:

or to any person, government, or subdivision of government without the United States purchasing such products, but in no case shall any of the moneys so advanced be expended without the United States.

In other words, this corporation can act as agent. Under the proposed amendment, it can not buy, but it can act as the agent of myself, for instance, a representative of the cotton producers, let us say, and assist me in selling my cotton to some one in Germany, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Poland, or any other countries, getting from the purchaser the best securities possible, advancing money to them on the securities, and then turning that money over to me; so I will get paid in that instance. That is the modus operandi of the corporation provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President—

Mr. RANDELL. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator from Illinois had not finished.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, under the provisions to which the Senator from Louisiana has alluded, the corporation may make advances to any government or subdivision of government without the United States.

Mr. RANDELL. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Requiring security equal to at least 100 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation.

Mr. RANDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMICK. Suppose the value of the security were to fall 30 per cent overnight, as now happens more often than not in some of the countries in which this cotton will be sold. Then what?

Mr. RANDELL. I suppose the corporation would be unfortunate in that instance, just as the Senator would be if he had loaned a man something on a security that lost its value. That might happen, as a matter of course. But I want to ask the Senator this, if it is not far better for our great Government, representing all the people and trying to look after the interests of its entire citizenry, to take chances on these securities falling 30 per cent overnight than it is for the private person to take that chance? The Government can take it better than the individual can.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; it took it in the matter of the railroads and the Shipping Board.

Mr. RANDELL. Yes; it took it on account of the greatest war the world ever saw, and the echoes of that war are unfortunately still with us. We can not get away from that war, Senators. That is the main difference between some Senators and myself. They are trying to apply to this awful situation the ordinary rules and practices of normal times. The times are abnormal and we can not apply to the present abnormal situation the rules and principles which govern business ordinarily. Just as we were compelled to have, or thought we were compelled to have, a railroad administration, and knew we had to have a shipping board, so, in my judgment, we need something now.

Let me read to Senators in this connection—and then I will be glad to answer any other questions—a statement that I find in the Washington Herald, the organ of Mr. Hoover, dated July 20. It is on the eleventh page, the last paragraph. This is the heading:

FIRMS OF ENGLAND WILL NOT INSURE EXPORT CREDITS—TOO LARGE AN UNDERTAKING FOR COMPANIES TO ASSUME RISK—POLITICS INVOLVED—BRITISH WRITER POINTS OUT THAT ONLY GOVERNMENT COULD TAKE CHANCE.

I hope Senators will listen to this, because it fits our situation as a glove fits the hand:

A writer to the Manchester Guardian-Commercial sets forth the principal reasons why insurance companies could not undertake the insurance of export credits, as proposed in Great Britain.

Reviewing the numerous new classes of risks assumed during the year, he said that up to two years ago it seemed as if the principles of insurance were flexible enough to adapt themselves to any contingencies; but, he adds, "We now know that they have definite limitations. Insurance can flourish in any direction except where it impinges upon politics; it can not exist when its commercial principles have to be tempered to the exigencies of a political situation."

Senators, that political situation exists all over the world to-day, and it is a bad one.

Two striking examples of this limitation are offered by unemployment.

Have you thought much about this unemployment problem? I have a letter here from the Secretary of Labor showing that on the 1st of January of this year four and one-half million people were unemployed in this country. I had a report from the Irving National Bank, of New York City, dated the 18th of this month, showing that the unemployment in 1,428 establishments in 65 of the biggest commercial centers of the country during the month of June increased 2.9 per cent as compared with May. Those firms, 1,428 of them, had 715,000 employees on the 1st of January. Up to the 1st of July they had discharged 101,000 of these employees.

All of us know, from the appeals of our friends and constituents, that the Government is turning its employees off very fast. We are going to hear more about the Government employees who are being thrown out of employment. Unemployment is growing by leaps and bounds. This writer in England speaks about unemployment there being one of the things against which they can not insure. Does any Senator here think an insurance company of this country would dare insure a man against unemployment? Certainly not; and yet we all know that the great English Lloyd's would insure against unemployment as it would insure against anything under the sun in normal times; but it will not do it now.

Mr. KING, Mr. McLEAN, and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RANDELL. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut, who rose first.

Mr. McLEAN. If there are 4,000,000 or more men out of employment in the country, I suppose a large percentage of them were dropped from manufacturing and mercantile establishments.

Mr. RANDELL. I imagine a great many of them were, but a great many came from the farms, because I have just stated that the cotton crop was reduced 30 per cent, and that certainly means less people on the farms.

Mr. McLEAN. That would certainly indicate that there is a large surplus of manufactured goods in this country—

Mr. RANDELL. I rather think so.

Mr. McLEAN. Which would like to have a market provided abroad for them.

Mr. RANDELL. Not necessarily abroad, I will say to the Senator. The best market for our manufactured goods is America. We buy 90 per cent of our own goods right here, and the farmers are about the best buyers of the manufactured goods. If we let them have this money to aid them to get rid of their surplus products, every dollar of it will stay in America, and every dollar of it will be paid out to the manufacturing establishments, to the merchants, and to the banks. It will not go abroad; it will stay here and help build up this country.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the Senator bear with me a moment?

Mr. RANDELL. Yes; I will.

Mr. McLEAN. America is the best market for American agricultural products—

Mr. RANDELL. Yes; and a mighty good market for manufactures, too.

Mr. McLEAN. Honors are even in that respect, so we will come back to the assumption, which I think is a correct one, that there is a very large quantity of manufactured goods in this country that would like a market somewhere at a profit.

Mr. RANDELL. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. Would not the Senator think it fair to include them in his bill with the agricultural products?

Mr. RANDELL. I will say to the Senator that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry feels that it is specially charged with the duty of looking after agriculture. We do not like to do everything in one bill. We felt that the War Finance Corporation was a very good institution, was getting along fairly well in some particulars, and was caring moderately for manufactures. It has loaned a great deal of money to the banks, which are extremely close to the manufactures. We felt that American agriculture, represented by 50 per cent of the people in round numbers and $77,000,000,000 of wealth, was important enough to require one commission to look after it.

We did not include manufactures, although we knew that perhaps something ought to be done for the manufactures. If the Senator from Connecticut, or some of those personally interested in the manufacturers, will prepare a similar bill to this in their behalf, I think he will find the agricultural Senators not particularly unfriendly to that measure.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. FERNALD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RANDELL. I yield first to the Senator from Maine, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I am deeply interested in the remarks of the Senator, and it is just occurring to me what is the purpose of the bill. I did not know the purpose of the bill really, but I can now see how it will be a very valuable measure and of great assistance to the people. I am sure the manufacturers in my section of the country would not object to a present market at a profitable price on their goods; and, if the Senator will join in supporting a bill where all products of the country would find a ready market at an advanced price, I can see how we can all be greatly benefited.

I did not quite understand, though I am learning much about the bill, how the poor fellows who are out of employment, 4,500,000 of them, about whom we have not heard much in the last three months, are going to be benefited. The arch defenders of the poor and oppressed for many weeks before November were talking of those men all over the country. I have not heard much of them of late. I can not readily understand how they will be benefited by an advance in the price of bread or wheat.

Mr. RANDELL. I will try to give the Senator the best answer I can. I do not pretend to intimate that we can legislate prosperity into the country. It is a doubtful problem. I am not wild enough to get up here and say we can legislate prosperity and get good prices for our agricultural and other products. We can only assist to the best of our ability; we can help along somewhat. That answers that part of the Senator's question.

As to helping the poor oppressed laboring man, suppose that the 250,000,000 bushels of surplus corn in the State of Iowa, as an illustration, instead of lying in the bins—much of it rotting and going to destruction—could have a market found for it in Europe, and the railroads could haul it to the seaboard at 36 cents per bushel transportation charge, would not that give a great many laborers work to-day who are now idle? Beyond question it would.

Suppose that 250,000,000 bushels of corn could be sold, and the farmers of Iowa could get 34 cents per bushel for it. That is what they are getting now, though I imagine it will bring a little more, but even if they got only 34 cents per bushel, out of which they would pay 14 cents per bushel for hauling to the elevator, sacking, and so forth, that would give work to many people who are now idle. It would furnish those farmers with a good many million dollars—250,000,000 times 34 cents in that State alone. The farmers would pay the banks, I take it; the banks in turn would pay some of their creditors. The money would get in trade; it would revive business. Where there is now stagnation it would make life.

It would make things move in a lively way, and hence unquestionably reduce the percentage of the 4,500,000 people now out of employment. It would be to the advantage of a large percentage of the unemployed.

Now, let me ask the Senator this question: The cotton crop last year fell off in value about $750,000,000 from $2,500,000,000; possibly less than that. It fell off in round numbers from $2,000,000,000 to $1,500,000,000. Suppose we had gotten that amount for cotton; where would the money have gone? Would it have stayed in the South? No. The southern cotton grower spends it very largely in New England and in the East Atlantic Seaboard States, spends some of it in the Senator's own State and buys those magnificent juicy commodities which his own firm manufactures into such wonderful foodstuffs. They would have spent that money in Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and other States to buy automobiles and machines of every kind and sort, to buy better foodstuffs than they raise down there. Every dollar of it practically would have been spent in the North. We could not spend it in the South because we have not got it; that is the only reason. The whole country would be benefited if we could dispose of our products.

I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator indicates that personally he would be willing to apply the principles of the Norris bill to all manufactures. Instead of making so many bites of the cherry, would it not be better for the Government to buy everything produced in the country at a high price and sell it at a low price, and thus bring prosperity to everybody?

Mr. RANDELL. No; I hardly think that would answer the distressed condition we are now in. I do not think the Senator can be trying to make any ridiculous answer to the argument which I am trying to present here.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President—

Mr. RANDELL. Just a moment. The manufacturers are not in the same distressed condition that the agriculturists are, if I know anything about it. I remember a debate between the former Senator from Alabama, Mr. Comer, and myself about a year ago, when there was evidence adduced on the floor of the Senate to show that the cotton manufacturers of the South had been making 300 per cent profit. I wish some one would show me a farmer who has been making any such big percentage of profit as that. I wish anyone would show me the farmer who has been charged with profiteering or who has been prosecuted for profiteering or who has been paying any very large excess-profits or income tax. The manufacturers of the country have been paying the very heaviest taxes of that sort. They are not in the same situation as the farmers at all. I indicated, and I again indicate, that if they need relief I would give them relief.

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I wish the Senator from Louisiana to understand that I am sympathizing with the farmers. I think I could qualify for admission into the agricultural bloc of the Senate. I think I probably own as many acres of poor land as any member of that bloc. Possibly I have lost on the average as much money in agricultural experiments. I know very well that with the untimely frosts and floods and droughts and hails and blights and bugs and uncertain prices the farmer has about as much chance to acquire an independence as John Brown had to exceed the longevity record.

But, Mr. President, there is a principle involved here which is basic and which I think the Senator will agree with me is very important. If, as the Senator says, the need of the agriculturists is to secure a market for their product—and I think that is what they need, not credit to carry them along a year or two, during which time they must pay interest, but a market, the best market they can obtain—

Mr. RANDELL. That is the principal thing they need.

Mr. McLEAN. I think that is what they need, and that is what I should like them to get, and I am willing to assist them in every way to get it. And it seems to me there certainly is a method by which the problem can be solved with entire justice to all concerned and without violating any principle.

If the Polish people, for instance, need wheat, and they have a Government there which is worthy of the name and which they can operate as a government, which is willing to stand back of the Polish people and issue its obligations or guarantee the obligations of the Polish buyer, it will be absolutely fair and feasible and workable in every way for an exchange to be created in this country whereby the Polish Government could issue its securities in denominations, we will say, of from $1 to $1,000, and those securities be turned over to the cotton grower or the wheat grower, or whoever has the cotton or the wheat or the agricultural product to sell. That is a fair transaction.

Mr. RANDELL. I will say to the Senator that that is the ordinary course of business, and in normal times that would operate. I wish to finish reading this article and show Senators the situation in England. They will see that the English people have come to the conclusion that the Government alone can fill the breach. Poland is now in such a situation that I am convinced a prudent business man like the Senator from Connecticut would not sell his own private goods on credit to Poland. A Polish mark is of such little value that it is said the Germans are using Polish marks as labels for their goods.

Mr. McLEAN. If that is true—

Mr. RANDELL. Pardon me. I wish to finish reading the article, and then I will hear the Senator further.

Mr. McLEAN. Very well.

Mr. RANDELL. Continuing the reading from the article in the Herald:

The difficulties are not obscure—

This writer continues—

if we reflect for a moment upon the essentials of the problem.

I will reach Poland in a moment.

"A," in Poland, say, wants to buy textile machinery from "B" in England. "A's" credit in Poland may be quite sound; if the problem were merely to insure that "A" after a period of 6 or 12 months would be able to put up a certain number of Polish marks, no great difficulty would arise. But that was not the problem; it was to insure that "A" after 6 or 12 months would be able to put up sterling in England for a certain amount. As the Polish Government prints notes at will to "pay" for its various ventures, the value of Polish marks leaps about. No one can say what the value of Polish marks expressed in sterling may be 6 or 12 months hence.

Credit insurance in a specific currency and within the limits of a specific country is a possible branch of insurance business, but no commercial insurance system can face simultaneously the three risks of (1) individual credit, (2) fluctuations in individual and national credit arising out of political adventures or disturbances, and (3) the fluctuations of exchange when any government may print as many currency notes as it pleases. In the course of their examination of the subject the insurance offices—and we believe also the banks—came to the conclusion that risks (2) and (3)—those of political adventures or disturbances and the fluctuations of exchange—could not be covered under any method of insurance. The risks were incalculable and no experience of the past gave the slightest indication of what those risks might be in the future.

POLITICAL RISKS.

In this matter of international credits the greater the need for insurance the more conspicuous appeared the impossibility of providing it upon the financial scale or with the flexibility which trade required. * * *

Now, I ask the attention of Senators to this:

The British Government was compelled to adopt a guaranty system of its own supported by the exchequer.

From the point of view of the insurance offices the problem was political not commercial. The Government's political purpose—a worthy and necessary purpose—was to find means—

Here is the point. I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to this—by which British goods could be sold to the distressed countries with collapsed exchanges, and so to lessen unemployment in Great Britain and to stimulate the markets abroad.

Is not that our situation? Is it not our desire to sell our goods abroad in the "collapsed countries" of Europe and relieve unemployment in our own land?

Mr. McLEAN and Mr. WILLIS rose.

Mr. RANDELL. In one moment I will yield. This article continues:

But the achievement of this purpose involved financial risks which no commercially run business organization could possibly face.

We may lay down the general principle that the moment politics enters substantially into a commercial risk the insurance market is compelled to step out and the Government step in.

Under the proposed substitute amendment we shall lend, if necessary, to the manufacturers and the farmers of this country $1,500,000,000 to enable them to hold their manufactured goods and their farm products; but what insurance will they be given, if they sell their goods to Poland, to Czechoslovakia, to Germany, or to certain other countries, that payment is going to be made to them? The risk is too great for private enterprise; the risk is too great for the Government to undertake; but it is far better that the Government undertake such a risky transaction than the individual. Now, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator from Louisiana is correct in his assumption that the probabilities all are that the parties who buy the goods will not pay for them, then it is very evident that whoever does pay for them will give them away.

Mr. RANDELL. I do not think that is the correct assumption. For instance, if our Government should sell to the people of Poland on terms of long credit, from three to five years, a large quantity of the corn, which now exists in such great abundance over the land, in order to help the Polish people tide over the distressful conditions in which they find themselves, I think they would eventually pay for it. Nothing would cause them to fail to pay for it except the failure of their Government. Possibly their Government may go to pieces.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. RANDELL. I will yield in one moment. Possibly their Government may go to pieces; if it does we should, perhaps, lose the money expended for the corn; but the Government of Poland would not give that corn away; it would sell it to its own citizens, and probably those citizens would pay for it.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Louisiana does not understand me. What he proposes would be taking money from one American pocket and loaning it to another.

Mr. RANDELL. Not to another American pocket. That money would all stay here. Let me explain to the Senator that under the pending bill we could not send any money abroad. We should loan to foreign peoples credits with which to buy American products here. That money would all go to the American farmers, and, as I have shown, the American farmers would take the money and pay debts with it or they would buy goods in New England or in other portions of the country. The money would all stay in America.

Mr. WILLIS. Who would furnish the money?

Mr. McLEAN. The man who furnished the money would never see it again.

Mr. RANDELL. The Government would furnish the money.

Mr. WILLIS. Where would the Government get it?

Mr. RANDELL. It would get it in part from these very farmers. Probably 50 per cent of it would come from the farmers themselves, as they constitute in point of numbers 50 per cent of the population, and the other 50 per cent would come, I take it, from the remainder of the American people.

I say to the Senator that, in my humble judgment, if every dollar of the $1,000,000,000 were lost it would be a wise expenditure. Did we hesitate one moment to lend our allies, not $1,000,000,000 but $9,000,000,000, when the war was on? We did that to save humanity. In my judgment, it is now necessary to save the agricultural interests of this country and to do something to help our farmers. The situation is serious.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. EDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RANDELL. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio, inasmuch as he has already asked me a question.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I wish to pursue the illustration which the Senator used concerning Poland and Great Britain. What is the reason that the people of Poland can not buy goods in Great Britain?

Mr. RANDELL. I assume it is because of the political situation, as the writer from whom I have quoted says. In Poland there is a very unstable government; no one can tell how long that government will last; and the rate of exchange as against Poland is extremely low.

Mr. WILLIS. Then, because of the unstable government and the unsatisfactory rate of exchange, there is no business man in Great Britain who would regard Polish security as good. The Senator thinks, as I understand him, that at that juncture it would be wise policy for the Government of Great Britain to tax all of its people in order to finance somebody in Poland, in order that the people of Poland may buy goods in Great Britain and make somebody in Great Britain prosperous. Is that the Senator's philosophy?

Mr. RANDELL. Not exactly.

Mr. WILLIS. Then, what is it?

Mr. RANDELL. If the people of Great Britain had a very considerable surplus of manufactured goods or agricultural commodities which were going to destruction, which were rotting in the bins, as corn in this country now is, as the Senator knows, I think it would be best for the Government to take some chance in selling that corn, not necessarily to Poland—I used Poland simply as an illustration—but wherever in the world it could sell it. If it sold a reasonable quantity of it to Poland in order to help the Poles get on their feet, I believe that would be a humanitarian effort and not an unwise piece of statesmanship. It is a matter, however, for the Government to handle and not for the individual; it is too big for the individual; the risk is too great; it is a matter for governments, not for individuals or private corporations.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but I wish to get his view of this matter. Now, taking our own case, there is so much corn in Iowa that can not be sold to the people in Europe. Those people want to buy our corn; they are hungry. We want to sell it. Why do they not buy it? Is it not because they can not pay for it and can not furnish security that any American business man would take? Is not that the reason?

Mr. RANDELL. They have not the money, I will say to the Senator; they need credit.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL. And some of them have pretty good security.

Mr. WILLIS. But it is security that an American business man would not now take. The proof of that is the fact that they will not take it.

Mr. RANDELL. I will say to the Senator that most of these new countries of Europe, especially those you mentioned, have no established credit rating because their banks are new and unknown. All business done heretofore was done through German or British banks of known standing. Now, they are independent countries and must build up their own banking institutions, and I will also say to the Senator that a great many American business men would not lend money under any circumstances. I heard one of the most reliable Members of the United States Senate say no longer ago than yesterday that he applied to a bank in his community—and he is a wealthy man—for $2,000, but he could not get it, because the bank had none to lend. It is almost impossible to get money now, and the Senator knows it as well as I do. Money is the most timid thing in the world; it is afraid of its own shadow, and, with so much trouble existing in the world, credit is not going to be given. The Government has got to step in if we are to extend any credits. Does the Senator believe that he as a business man would be willing to sell his corn to the people in Poland or the people in Germany or the people in Italy or the people in France or the people in any other country? No; he would not do it.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly, I would not, and, therefore, I do not think that is the wise policy on the part of the Government to pass a law that will provide ultimately that all the people of this country who pay the taxes must advance of their substance in order to enable people in Poland to buy corn of us. That is my position.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. RANDELL. In one moment I will yield. Does not the Senator think the Government has to take a very broad view of some economic questions? When there is a very serious situation, a very bad situation, confronting 50 per cent of its citizens, and when that bad situation can be relieved at a chance with an investment, let us say, of $1,000,000,000, a portion of which may never be paid back, and when the investment of that money will not only save the great agricultural industry of this country, but will relieve unemployment very materially, and will help manufacturers very materially, is not that a broad piece of statesmanship that the country can well afford to undertake, and is that piece of statesmanship on broad lines comparable to the business of a private citizen? Not at all Senators; it is a different thing altogether.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator propounds that as an inquiry to me, I do not think that it is broad statesmanship to adopt a system under which all of the people shall be required to pay taxes in order to enable some of the people to sell their products. I do not believe that is wise. But if the Senator will answer one other question I shall not interrupt him further. It will develop the difference of opinion between him and me. Why did the committee make the change which it proposes to make in sections 13 and 14? The author of the bill very wisely provided in section 14 substantially the same thing that is provided in section 17 of the War Finance Corporation act. I have it here.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes up that matter, will he let me interrupt the Senator from Louisiana on a question that has been passed by?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest that it seems to me it comes with poor grace from men who are in favor of the substitute to continually give out the impression that this bill provides that we must sell products to Poland and that Poland is bankrupt.

The Senator from Louisiana has had only the opportunity of hearing the bill read by the Secretary. While other Senators have been in secret conclave and have had inside information, he has had to listen to it as it came from the Secretary's lips; but coming from them, is it not true that under the substitute the War Finance Corporation could advance money to exporters of goods to Poland?

Mr. RANDELL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. And that they could sell to Polish people, the Polish Government, or what not, and if they failed the exporter, who depended on them to make this payment to the War Finance Corporation, would fail, and hence the same difficulty would arise that arises under their construction of the original bill? In other words, they say we are passing a law that will result in selling goods to a bankrupt party or nation, when there is not a single syllable in the bill that requires such a sale. There is not anything different as far as that point is concerned—the loss of exported goods—between the bill and the substitute. In either case there may be a loss, and will be a loss, if the persons taking the security are not careful.

Mr. RANDELL. I thank the Senator for that explanation. Just let me add to what he is saying, that the Export Corporation is composed of three men, one of whom is the Secretary of Agriculture, and the other two are to be appointed by the President. I should not be a bit surprised if the President named Secretary Mellon as one of them, or Mr. Eugene Meyer, the head of the War Finance Corporation, as one. He surely is going to pick out two of the very best men in America.

The bill provides that Mr. Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture, shall be one, and I do not imagine that a board such as the President will name is going to do anything very unwise. I do not share the fears of some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that a man whose whole heart and soul is wrapped up in agriculture—as is Mr. Secretary Wallace—is likely to go into the exportation of shoes and other manufactured goods. I do think, however, that these men will have to be permitted to take some risks which this proposed substitute does not permit of or little or no business will be done. Of our total surplus, admittedly at least one billion, the War Finance Corporation, owing to restricted credit limits, has actually been able to move less than 2 per cent, and if we do not throw down the bars and take a chance we will accomplish nothing by all this controversy.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana further yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry this morning agreed to several committee amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill that will show those committee amendments, so that Senators may have it to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CURTIS. Does that include the amendment offered to-day by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]—all amendments?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. CURTIS. Just the committee bill with the amendments?

Mr. NORRIS. The same bill, with the changes that the committee made by their amendments this morning.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, it is so ordered.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I suggest that before we adjourn to-day I suppose an order will be made for publishing this substitute if that is necessary. It will be published as a matter of course; will it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Louisiana that the substitute has already gone to the Printing Office.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is what I assumed. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana one further question touching the liability of the Government.

Section 17 of the War Finance Corporation act provides:

That the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation.

The author of this bill, in my judgment, very wisely provided in section 14—

That the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation.

Substantially the same thing as section 17 of the War Finance Corporation act. Now, the committee of which the Senator is a distinguished and most capable member provides in section 13—

That the United States shall be liable for the payment of all bonds and other obligations, together with interest thereon, issued by the corporation.

To me, that is the crux of this bill—that it is proposed to make the United States Government liable for all the bonds and obligations of this corporation. Why did the committee, in its wisdom, make that very vital change in the bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. Because the committee did not wish to do a vain and foolish thing. The committee did not wish to limit the activities of this corporation to $100,000,000, and it felt that if the Government was not to be liable for the securities issued by the corporation under the terms of the bill those securities would not be salable, and that after exporting or giving credit to the extent of $100,000,000 they would then be at the end of their rope, they could do nothing else, and the purposes of the bill would not be accomplished. One of the things that influenced us was the extreme difficulty the Federal farm loan bank is having in disposing of its bonds. Those bonds, as the Senator knows, are secured by first mortgage on real estate at not more than 50 per cent of the estimated value of that real estate; and not only that, but every one of the 12 banks of the system is responsible for every obligation issued by any one of the banks; yet in spite of that wonderful security it is practically impossible for the Federal farm loan banks to sell their bonds. We felt that if we are going to accomplish something we must be frank and manly about it, and not attempt to fool the farmers—they are pretty sensible people—not offer them something that never would amount to what they expected of it. That is why we put it in there.

Mr. WILLIS. I thank the Senator for that response, but I still do not fully understand the reason that he assigns. The Senator does not maintain that the Congress did a vain and foolish thing when it provided, under the War Finance Corporation act, that the United States should not be liable. There has been no difficulty about disposing of those bonds. Why does the Senator think, therefore, that it would be necessary to provide in this act that the United States must be liable?

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to say to the Senator, with all due respect to the War Finance Corporation, that the bonds spoken of by the Senator as having been sold by the War Finance Corporation never existed. If the Senator will take the trouble to inform himself he will, if I am not mistaken, find out that the War Finance Corporation has not even used a small portion of its initial capital.

I dislike repeating these statements which show how little has been done by this organization, for I am convinced they have done their best, but your questions keep forcing this weakness to the surface.

It has done it in the most cautious manner, in a manner which would be approved by the most conservative banker in the United States. We felt, sir, that we had to get away from the strict business principles governing and controlling the War Finance Corporation. We felt that if we were really going to export anything abroad, we must take some risks. The War Finance Corporation does not take any risks. It can not take any risks, under the terms of the act. It has been administered as well as it could be administered under the terms of the act. Its managers have been patriotic, but they have been able to put out very, very little money. We regarded the agricultural situation as a great emergency. We thought it was necessary to do something now, not six months from now, not four months from now, but to do it now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the Senator from Louisiana say whether or not the amendments just offered by the Senator from Nebraska eliminate this governmental guaranty?

Mr. RANSDELL. No, sir; they do not eliminate the governmental guaranty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do those amendments eliminate the exemption on these bonds?

Mr. RANSDELL. No, sir; they do not eliminate it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do those amendments eliminate the power given to this corporation to buy and sell?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; they eliminate that. They strike out that clause in section 9 which begins, on line 25, with the figure "1," and reads:

To buy agricultural products either in their natural state or prepared or manufactured from any person within the United States and to sell such products to any person or Government or subdivision of Government without the United States.

Those words are stricken out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the governmental guaranty of the bonds remains, and also the tax exemption?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir; and I will tell you another thing which was put in. In section 10, line 7, page 6, the amount is reduced from ten times the paid-up capital to five times.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So that the aggregate of the bonds shall not exceed $500,000,000?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir. It was $1,000,000,000 before—ten times $100,000,000. That would be, in the aggregate, $1,000,000,000. That has been reduced one-half.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator stated, as I understood him, a moment ago that we desire an agency that will act promptly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That we must not wait five or six months for relief; that we need it right away. I agree with the Senator in that; but does he not think that it will take four or five or six months to get the agency provided in this bill in operation, at least judging from experience in the past; and if it is desirable—and I think it is—that we shall have an agency that will act promptly, would it not be wiser and better to take an agency that is already in existence, organized, and acting?

Mr. RANDELL. If we are to judge the future by the past, I will say to the Senator that it will probably take a good, long while, but I hope that the great chief of the party, of which the Senator is such an honored member, will, if we pass this bill, realize that a great emergency confronts us, and act very promptly. I will further say to the Senator that if the amendments proposed to the War Finance Corporation act produce the relief which all of us here feel is so essential, it probably could function more promptly than the proposed corporation.

Personally, I am very glad that this substitute has been offered, because it is at least a promise of something. No promise whatsoever was held out to the agriculturists until we presented this bill. Nobody was solicitous for them. Nobody was asking that they be given $500,000,000, or any other sum, until the Agricultural Committee brought in this bill and debated it very thoroughly; and then somebody woke up and realized that we must do something for the farmers, and they offered a substitute here which will, I imagine, do some good. It will give some credit to the farmers. It will help them in that way. It is certainly better than nothing; and if we can not get the Norris bill, the other, in my judgment, is a whole lot better than nothing.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. RANDELL. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Does not the Senator consider that the passage of the emergency bill, which revived the War Finance Corporation and permitted them to do the work they are now engaged in, was some consideration to the problem which the farmers are facing?

Mr. RANDELL. It was a little, and it originated, I will say to the Senator, with the Committee on Agriculture, not with any other committee. In that connection, I say to the Senator that we have done a little something for foreign exports. We passed the Webb-Pomerene Act, if I mistake not, for the purpose of permitting combinations of exporters, in the hope that they would really do some business abroad; then we assisted the Senator in passing a bill to which his name is attached, the Edge Export Corporation Act, for the purpose of assisting in foreign exports; then we revived the War Finance Corporation.

Unfortunately, Senators, this is a very dangerous disease. We gave it a little mild treatment, what might be called weak pills, with the Webb-Pomerene bill. Then we gave it some stronger bitters through the Edge export corporation act, and recently we applied a pretty strong tonic—or we thought we were applying one—in the War Finance Corporation act. But none of them has accomplished very great results. The agricultural world is still in the slough of despond, and we have to do something else, and if the efforts of the Committee on Agriculture accomplish no more than to get the loan of $1,500,000,000, as provided by the substitute, I think our efforts will have been pretty well paid for.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. RANDELL. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I think I heard the Senator remark a while ago that, in his judgment, even if the Government lost the entire $100,000,000 in financing exportations, it would be money well spent, if it assisted the farmers in their present difficulty.

Mr. RANDELL. I said the farmers and the people of America—bankers, merchants, and manufacturers—who would get that money which the farmers would pay over to them. It would not be confined to the farmers.

Mr. EDGE. Then does not the Senator from Louisiana, holding that view, believe that it might be better to directly pay them in some form of subsidy, a pure, unadulterated subsidy, rather than run the additional risk, with the additional expense, the overhead expense and loss, of establishing or erecting a business in Washington?

Mr. RANDELL. No; I do not think that would be a wise plan; but it seems to me we had a message a few minutes ago which practically called for a good, big subsidy to the railroads. I do not favor a subsidy unless it is in the case of a very great emergency. But I will say to the Senator, if a subsidy must come to maintain the American merchant marine, on which we have expended over $3,000,000,000, I am one Democrat who will not be scared by that word "subsidy." We have to maintain the property of this great country. We have to maintain that American merchant marine and make it go, and we have to maintain the agricultural interests of this country. We must do, by legislation, whatever is necessary to keep our farmers going and make them prosperous.

All wealth, as the Senator knows, comes from the soil, and we must stand by those who till it. If he calls that a subsidy, it does not alarm me in the least. I do not consider it such.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I speak as one of those who joins with the Senator from Louisiana. The word "subsidy," under certain emergency conditions, is not to be sidetracked. I am not afraid of the word, either, so I am simply coming back to the thought that if the agricultural situation is as bad as represented—and I appreciate it is very bad—and if it will be necessary, as has been more or less brought out in debate, to sell these surplus farm products, if surpluses exist, to nations whose credit is questionable or doubtful, then perhaps it will be wise—I am not prepared to say it is, because I am not entirely sure of the existence of all these surplus stocks—perhaps it will be wise to consider frankly an unadulterated subsidy to those people who are suffering rather than to run this additional risk and incur the additional expense of setting up a business in Washington and of running it by the Government. I say in all seriousness, with the condition as it is, I would rather face a plain, unadulterated subsidy under the name and under the word "subsidy" than to resort to the subterfuge of running a business from Washington, that which can never, in my judgment, be successful.

Mr. RANDELL. Of course, the Senator's argument is based upon his assumption that these credits would all be ill-advised and the amounts would not be paid back. I have looked into it as well as I could, and am convinced that a great proportion of these advances would be paid back. Some of them, probably, never would be returned; but, Senators, it is my candid conviction, after giving it the best thought I have been able to give, that if we extend a reasonable credit to these foreign nations who need our surplus products, and do not charge them too great a rate of interest, and allow them two, three, or five years in which to pay it back, practically every dollar loaned to them in the way of credits by sale of our goods will be returned. I have said, and I repeat, that possibly some of it will never come back, but do not overlook the fact that the money does not go abroad; the goods go abroad. The American owner of those goods is paid for them, and he in turn scatters that money around. It revives business, it stays here in our country, and it would be very different, I submit, from a subsidy. The principle of the thing would be altogether different from that of a subsidy.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. RANDELL. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Assuming that these foreign countries will not pay, then, I ask the Senator, who will pay?

Mr. RANDELL. It would be a dead loss.

Mr. LENROOT. Who will pay the loss?

Mr. RANDELL. The people of America, the same people who paid the loss on our shipping program; the same people who are paying the loss resulting from the Government operation of railroads; the same people who are paying a good many other losses suffered by the Government; and who are going to pay a good part of the $10,000,000,000 we loaned to our allies.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, I ask the Senator whether he believes prosperity can be restored in America by piling up additional losses?

Mr. RANDELL. That depends. If the Government, by investing $1,000,000,000, can revive and put on its feet a struggling industry, engaged in by 50 per cent of its citizenry, I think it is justified. Many a time when I have had a bad investment, I have thrown what was called good money after bad, but it did not always turn out badly; it sometimes turned out well, and I saved the investment. Every prudent business man knows that there are times when he has to take risks; when he has to spend money in order to save some that would be lost if he did not risk an additional amount.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RANDELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and heard the testimony of Mr. Hoover and Mr. Meyer. I hastily read the testimony of Mr. Hoover—I might say all the testimony before the committee—but, as I recall Mr. Hoover's testimony, it is very clear that this bill will not accomplish any of the results which the Senator seeks to have accomplished. As I recall, he stated that the corporation provided for in this bill would not find any additional markets for the surplus agricultural products of the United States. Does the Senator think that the testimony of Mr. Hoover is not to be believed, or is not to be relied upon, and that his knowledge of European conditions is so imperfect that we should rely upon the statements of others who are not so familiar with European conditions rather than upon his?

Mr. RANDELL. Answering the Senator's question, I have in my hand a speech delivered in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, April 16 last, by Mr. Herbert Hoover, on "The economic administration during the armistice," dated the 15th of April. Here are some of the things he said:

"To meet this demand—for supplies of food and textiles to our allies—we, in America, through the extra exertion of our farmers and the savings of our women, had at the armistice prepared a surplus of some 20,000,000 tons of food and textile supplies, the minimum amount necessary to have carried the European allies in the war until the harvest of 1919.

"In order to stimulate production in the United States and to meet the economic levels resulting from allied buying before we came into the war, we had given moral pledges"—

I hope the Senator will listen to this—

"and in some cases legal pledges to our farmers that they should realize certain basic prices for their produce.

"The price levels at the armistice in the isolated markets of the Southern Hemisphere were scarcely one-half those in the United States, and the Allies naturally wished to abandon our market.

"The motion of this swollen stream of supplies that passed from the farm house, through the manufacturer to the American seaboard, could not be interrupted by a diversion such as the Allies contemplated without a price collapse, thus not only betraying the assurances given to American farmers but bringing a complete financial crash to the whole of our interior banks, for they, in loans to the farmer and manufacturer, had given confidence in the stability of prices."

Then he added:

"We Americans, on the other hand, were compelled to insist that we could not have a break in the level which we had assured our farmers and our manufacturers in order to secure a production on allied behalf. We ultimately succeeded in preventing a break by using the resources made available under our own war powers in purchase of food supplies, and we were able to tide over the readjustment period without a debacle in the United States."

Senators, a debacle is a rout, stampede, downfall. It seems to me we are pretty nearly in the midst of a debacle right now, though I am very sorry to feel obliged to say so.

I wish to read further from another speech of Mr. Hoover, in answer to the Senator's question, delivered at Atlantic City, before the United States Chamber of Commerce on the 28th of April, just a few days after he delivered the Philadelphia speech, and this is in special reference to the Senator's question:

"We are at a disadvantage against European manufacturers and exporters in our foreign marketing machinery and our lack of foothold in industry abroad. Except in a few industries, we do not have an adequate representation of native Americans in wholesale business, and in general business enterprises in foreign countries." * * *

"Every merchant will agree with me that the sale of goods abroad is a matter of salesmanship and national sentiment as well as of quality and prices. None except our own citizens can properly represent these factors. We can liken our present foreign marketing system to a supply train and a general staff, with no fighting men on the front. Our competitors hold the front line and naturally we lose the market when competition arises.

"In addition to distribution, one of the strongest foundations of foreign trade is our own citizens engaged in foreign industry. Their enterprises constitute a constant pull of machinery and supplies. It is useless for the Government to say to Americans, 'Exile yourselves; get into business, distribution, and industry; protect our foreign trade.' Other nations, even under the pressure of necessity, have required generations to build up their marketing systems and their foreign industries. Our Government has tried to devise a short cut to the establishment of distribution agencies through the Webb-Pomerene law, by which the risks that individuals would hesitate to take can be spread over numbers of manufacturers."

It will be seen that he calls attention to the Webb-Pomerene law, under which the risk which individuals would hesitate to take can be spread over a number of manufacturers.

He continues:

"If our laws are inadequate to stimulate production and give equality to American citizens who exiled themselves in trade abroad, then we should legislate further."

That is what Mr. Hoover stated on the 28th of April.

"We should legislate further."

This is the first piece of legislation I know anything about that has been undertaken.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

Mr. RANDELL. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator.

He concludes:

"One thing is certain, that so long as nonresident Americans are the only nationality who pay income taxes to their home Governments on foreign earnings, they have no equality in competition."

Here is the Secretary of Commerce telling us—and I am going to bring it out in detail in a moment—that so long as nonresident Americans are the only nationality who have to pay income taxes to their home Government on their foreign earnings they have no equality in competition. Are Senators aware of that? Do they know that when an American exporter engages in business in any foreign country and his earnings are $100,000, let us say, that he has to pay his income tax and his excess-profits tax on that earning, while his foreign competitors from France, England, and Japan do not pay any income or excess-profits tax? I will go into that in detail in a moment.

I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator permit me to suggest, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], that if Mr. Hoover is correct and no market will be developed under the Norris bill, not a penny will be expended and therefore no taxpayer will be charged with a single nickel?

Mr. RANDELL. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. It is absolutely pertinent. I now wish to call the attention of the Senate to a very interesting bulletin issued this month—July—the exact date is not given—by the National Foreign Trade Council, of New York City, of which Mr. James J. Farrell is president. I hope I can have the close attention of the Senate, for this is something that was entirely new to me, and I doubt if it is known by other Senators who insist on private persons doing this export business.

Do you Senators on the other side of the aisle know that when a private exporter in this country sends his goods to Europe, Asia, or Africa he has to pay income and excess-profits taxes on his earnings, while his foreign competitor who sells goods in the same countries does not have to pay those taxes at all? The United States is the only country in the world which imposes income and excess-profits taxes upon the earnings of her people engaged in foreign trade. If our Government itself were to engage in this trade to the extent of selling our surplus agricultural products, it would not be handicapped in that way. Let me give a concrete illustration that has been worked out in this bulletin in case No. 1.

This is a country where no substantial taxes are levied. Let us say $100,000 is the income of the man engaged in business in this foreign country where no substantial taxes are levied by the Government. The United States income tax on that earning would be $31,190. That $31,190 would be a handicap as against the competing Frenchman, Briton, or Jap. How can our people survive against such a handicap as that?

Here is case No. 2 in a country where taxes other than income or excess-profits taxes are levied. We take the same earnings, $100,000. The foreign tax on that amount would be about $1,800. The net income in that instance would be $98,200. The United States income tax would be $30,182. The United States exporter would have to pay that $30,182 of tax, which is not exacted by Great Britain, Japan, or France from its exporter engaged in the same business. How can he stand such a handicap as that?

At the proper time, no matter what issue the pending bill may take, I propose to offer an amendment to the revenue laws correcting that great inequality and placing our foreign traders on terms of parity with the traders of other countries.

I have had to proceed in a rather desultory way owing to the number of interruptions, but I wish now to read from an exceedingly interesting speech delivered by Mr. Crissinger, Comptroller of the Currency, one of the warmest personal friends of the President, and, according to my information, one of the ablest and best men connected with this administration. This speech was delivered to the Ohio Bankers' Association in the city of Toledo on the 14th of this month, thus being a very recent utterance. Here is what he said, in part:

"Our farmers, stimulated by the Government's appeals and by patriotic purposes to win the war, put their energies and resources into the production of world supplies, and at the same time were denied by the Government, in some instances, an open market, ruled by the free law of supply and demand, in which to sell. They were not permitted to profiteer. Their profits were intended to be a fair recompense for service but hardly for investment. The war's end found the farm machine producing more and more, and this production reached its maximum in the crop season of 1920."

This is no farmer making that statement. This is the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Crissinger, saying that we induced the farmers in every way to make this great surplus production and that it reached its maximum in the crop season of 1920. He then continues:

"The order for deflation, for such it was construed to be, found granaries and warehouses bulging with farm products produced at war costs, which were and are being sold, when buyers can be found, at less than half their production costs. The result is an imposition of distress, of bankruptcy, upon farmers by millions. And this distress has been reflected in our industries. So it should be, and is our business—"

Senators, please listen to Mr. Crissinger—

"So it should be, and is, our business now to open up markets for our surplus wares in order to ameliorate this condition. We must be mindful that to prosper our own people is our first duty."

That speech convinces me that Mr. Crissinger is a wise man, with a just comprehensive grasp of some very difficult questions.

The essential purpose of the pending bill is to open markets. My contention is that the provisions of the substitute, while helpful to a very great degree, while infinitely better than the nothing that was offered us before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry presented the pending bill, will not furnish markets for our surplus products in anything like the same degree that the Norris bill will furnish them. I am glad that the administration has finally interested itself and offered that much.

Mr. President, the farmers are charged with hoarding, at least the wheat growers were charged with hoarding, but let me give just a fact or two in connection with that hoarding.

Speculators out in the cities of the State represented, in part, by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], the author of the substitute bill, bought very extensively of wheat in Canada. Something like 56,000,000 bushels of wheat were purchased in Canada in the last 11 months. Owing to the difference in exchange between Canada and this country, those speculators made about 35 to 40 cents per bushel on that Canadian wheat and cleaned up, so I am reliably informed, something like $30,000,000 by their speculating in that Canadian wheat. I am not criticizing that, but I am offering it as a reason why the wheat farmers of the West could not sell their wheat. The men who needed wheat were buying Canadian wheat, and it was not until the price had gone down considerably that the farmers of the Dakotas had a chance to sell their wheat.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator is mistaken about 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 or 70,000,000 bushels of wheat having been purchased in Minnesota on account of the difference in the rate of exchange. The fact is that the reason why the wheat was purchased was that after the Canadian Government had removed any duty on wheat to the United States, under the Underwood tariff bill, the wheat came in free, and from the time that the war embargoes and the duty were removed in Canada on the 1st of September, 1920, until the emergency tariff bill was passed in 1921 there was no duty, and from 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat was bought because there was no duty upon it. That is the reason why it was purchased.

There is no question that the difference in the rate of exchange also aided the American purchaser, because he paid for his wheat in American dollars and got the advantage of the premium in Canada. It was not confined to Minnesota alone. It was all along the Canadian border. Chicago, Milwaukee, Buffalo, and every city that could bought Canadian wheat when the tariff bars were let down and wheat was allowed to come in free. Those are the facts.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to have the Senator's explanation. He corroborates what I said, but he did not go into quite as much detail as I did. As long as I am not a wheat grower or very familiar with wheat, I am going to read the exact explanation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not agree with the Senator. I stated the facts.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was stating facts, too, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is reading from some paper and I do not know what it is.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; and it is just as reliable a man who gave it to me as any Senator on the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not deny it. I simply say that the reason why I supported the emergency tariff bill was because

I thought the farmer was entitled to some market, and the merchants and manufacturers, too.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; and I supported it, too. There is no difference between the Senator and myself about that. The Senator corroborates what I said. The Senator said there was a difference in exchange. That is the only point.

Let me read it, so the Senator will see there is no difference between us. We do not wish to fall out over a very simple matter. Here is what my informant said:

"The importation of wheat from Canada during the last 11 months was 56,000,000 bushels. The Canadian price in the early part of the season averaged $2.30 per bushel sterling. During the same time it was $2.26 in the United States. At that time sterling was worth about $3.80, as compared with the normal rate of $4.86. At this difference in exchange the American purchaser of Canadian wheat received from 40 cents to 65 cents per bushel in exchange alone over and above the price of the American wheat."

Of course they did not have to pay duty on it; it came in free.

"In round numbers the value of sterling was 20 per cent less than our money, hence Canadian wheat cost $2.30 less 20 per cent, or about 46 cents per bushel, which makes an average of around 42 cents less than the American price."

"Forty per cent of all wheat and flour traded on the Minnesota exchange during the 11 months ending May 31 last was Canadian, and the American dealers in Canadian wheat cleared in round numbers $30,000,000 on exchange alone. They did not purchase wheat from the American farmers, but purchased in Canada"—

I would have done likewise if I had been one of them. If I had an opportunity to save 42 cents a bushel on wheat, I am sure I would have gone up there and bought it.

"sending all their buyers to Canada, and taking over 56,000,000 bushels of this Canadian wheat at a time when the price was up and the American farmers anxious to sell, but had no market for their product. These operations in Canadian wheat prevented our farmers from selling at least to the extent of 56,000,000 bushels until the price had gone down very materially, and they were obliged to dispose of their wheat at a much less price. Yet these American wheat farmers were called hoarders by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board when they were trying to sell and could not do so because of the great advantage enjoyed by the Canadian wheat growers through the manipulations of the speculators on the Minnesota exchange"—

And I suppose also the Chicago Exchange. I do not reckon they let a plum like that go by them. I do not imagine that the constituents of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCormick] would let such an opportunity as that go by. The article further states that they "reaped $30,000,000 by their unholy activities."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Louisiana explain what manipulation there was about it?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know that there was any manipulation. I am reading what the memorandum sets forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has just read from some article or statement by a gentleman who he says is reliable as is any Senator upon the floor.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Who is the gentleman?

Mr. WADSWORTH. What manipulation or speculation was there involved in American wheat buyers purchasing Canadian wheat at a cheaper price because there was no duty?

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the writer of this article use the word "manipulation"?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Louisiana just read it.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Who is the gentleman?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes. The word "manipulation" is used in this article. I do not know that there was any unjust manipulation. I said that if I had been there I would have done the same.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Who is the gentleman who prepared the article?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Louis F. Crossette, who is a most reliable man.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Is he an operator?

Mr. RANSDELL. No, sir; he is not an operator.

Mr. MCCORMICK. What is he?

Mr. RANSDELL. He is a gentleman who is engaged in the business of agriculture, one of the most honorable businesses of which I know in the world.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Is he engaged in agriculture in the section of the country referred to?

Mr. RANSDELL. I think his home is in Utah. He was down here assisting the Agricultural Committee. He testified before that committee several times. He is one of the most intelligent men I have ever met, and, I believe, a thoroughly reliable man. He is vouched for, I will say, by Mr. Carl Vrooman, the recent Assistant Secretary of Agriculture and one of the constituents of the Senator from Illinois. I do not think there was anything objectionable in this so-called manipulation. If I had been doing business up there on the exchange and had a chance to buy wheat in Canada at a saving to me of 42 cents a bushel, I should have bought it.

Senators, do not misunderstand me. My only purpose in bringing this out is to defend the wheat growers of the West from an accusation that I consider unfair—that they were hoarding—when they had not a chance to sell, and the reason they did not sell was because 56,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat were being bought and brought in by Americans. That is the only point.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator on the hoarding proposition?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator observe from the reading of the famous document which emerged into the public light to-day that it provides for hoarding?

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator from Louisiana observe that this famous amendment has a provision in it which permits hoarding?

Mr. RANSDELL. It specifically provides for it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. It enables any farmer to secure a loan of money and to hoard his products for as long as five years. I understand under the substitute one may borrow and re-borrow, may discount and rediscount his paper for five years. It is the greatest hoarding proposition I have ever seen.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator from Louisiana opposed to the kind of hoarding, so-called, for which the proposed substitute provides?

Mr. RANSDELL. I want to get some money to enable me to carry my products, if I can not sell them. I had rather sell them and close my books; but if I can not do so, I should be mighty thankful to our good Government if it would lend me some money to enable me to carry my products, for it is very hard for me to get money from the banks to carry it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the Senator does not oppose it?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have said several times, and the Senator would have heard me had he been listening, that the amendment contains much merit; it is the next best thing to the Norris bill.

Mr. NORRIS. May I again interrupt the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to have the Senator do so.

Mr. NORRIS. The criticism was made in reference to the bill as reported by the committee that it would permit the buying of agricultural products and then hoarding them, which was objected to, but the amendment provides for hoarding, not by buying but by loaning money on them. Eventually, of course, if the owner of the product keeps up the borrowing long enough, the interest will eat up everything and he will not have anything left to hoard.

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly; and it will encourage people to store products much of which are seriously injured by being kept for a long time.

I am not an authority on corn, but I know that down in my section of the country we can not keep corn over 12 months. Perhaps in the West it may be kept indefinitely, but it may not be so kept down South.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Who made the argument against the Norris bill on the ground that it permitted hoarding?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not recall the name of the Senator now, but I assure the Senator from Minnesota that that objection was made and emphasized and paraded here in the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not do it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not accuse the Senator of having done that; but it was stated that if the bill was passed it would have the effect not of selling our agricultural products but of piling them up. That was a terrible vice in the original bill, but it is a virtue under the substitute. I called it to the Senator's attention simply to emphasize the method of argument being employed. I am not objecting to it in the proposed substitute, for if we are going to have the substitute adopted I think that is a good provision. I have referred to it not by way of criticizing that provision but to call attention to the unfair method of argument that is being used, that it is a sin to make such provision in the committee bill but a virtue to make it in another way in the proposed substitute bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, one of the great criticisms that this side of the Chamber and Senators from agricultural States on the other side of the Chamber have been making for the last six or eight months against the Federal Reserve Board is that by its rulings with reference to loans the farmers of the South and West, who could find no market for their products, were not permitted to borrow money through their home banks for the purpose of enabling them to withhold those products from the market, because the Federal reserve bank refused to advance money to the member banks or to the State banks through the member banks upon advances made to farmers for the purpose of enabling them to hold their crops. That, of course, was placing an interdict, so far as the Federal Reserve Board through the exercise of its power could place one, upon the procedure which was the salvation of the farmers of the South of raising money upon that part of their crop which they were unwilling to sacrifice by throwing it upon the market when there was no market. It seems to me a strange proposition that the Senator from Louisiana or any other Senator should now be finding fault either with the Norris bill or with the substitute for the Norris bill because it provides a systematic method by which farmers may withhold their crops from the market by which they may secure loans upon advances that are made for that purpose, and not have that class of security tabooed by an institution of the Government upon the ground that it is speculative, and that, too, at a time when that institution was loaning millions upon millions of dollars through the Federal reserve bank of New York to the stock gamblers of that city.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina surely misunderstood me. I have not criticized the proposed substitute at all. I have said time and again that the proposed substitute was a very good piece of legislation, although nothing like as good, in my judgment, as the Norris bill, but one which would be very helpful if we can not secure the passage of the Norris bill. I want to notify Senators right now that if we can not secure the passage of the Norris bill I am going to take the proposed substitute as the next best thing and vote for it.

I think the next best thing to enabling the farmer to sell his goods—his cotton, tobacco, wheat, corn, or whatever products he may have—is to lend him money on reasonable rates of interest to permit him to hold his crop. I understand that in many instances banks are crowding farmers and insisting upon the sale of their products that the farmers' debts may be paid. If the substitute bill be adopted I think that in many instances farmers are going to be given reasonable loans on their products, permitting them to pay the banks, which, I must say, have been very lenient with them, in the main, and enable them to continue to hold their agricultural products, if necessary, for four or five years. That is what I said. The Senator surely misunderstood me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator as animadverting upon hoarding, and I understood the Senator from Nebraska to acquiesce.

Mr. RANSDELL. Not at all. The Senator from Nebraska did not acquiesce in such a suggestion or animadvert upon it at all; it was simply arguendo; he was answering an argument of the other side against hoarding by showing that the proposed substitute provided for hoarding a great deal more than did the original bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. A most dangerous method sometimes of animadverting is arguendo, as suggested by the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I distinctly stated, not because I was criticizing the provision but in answer to a criticism that was made that the committee bill provided a means by which agricultural products could be hoarded, that the proposed substitute specifically provided for hoarding in another way which I think is more objectionable than the method provided in the committee bill, if either one be objectionable. I think it is a good provision; I was only answering the argument of those who are complaining about the committee bill that it will enable products to be bought and kept out of the market. Nothing of the kind has been intended, although technically it might be done. I was answering that argument against the bill by showing that the substitute, this holy of holies, that has come into the Senate to-day contains a provision of the same kind, and those who are fighting the original bill on that ground certainly ought to be opposed to the proposed substitute.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, accepting the disclaimer of both of the Senators, I want to say that for myself I welcome the kind of hoarding which both the Norris bill and the substitute provide for.

Mr. NORRIS. So do I.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, if I may be permitted—I have just about finished my argument—I want to call attention to one or two criticisms which seem to me very unfair by way of comparing the pending bill with the act establishing the Shipping Board.

Poor old Shipping Board! It does not seem to have very many friends on the floor of the Senate at this time. I am one of its friends; I think it is a great institution. I think it is going to become greater all the time, although we have got to charge off a big portion of the war costs, just as we charged off the war costs of the Navy and the Army and many other things. I am not going into detail on that subject now; but it seems to me very unfair to criticize this proposition, because the Shipping Board cost a lot of money and was handled badly in war time, when everybody was saying, "Ships! Ships! More ships! For God's sake, get the boys across the sea! We must do it. We must not spare any money at all." We saw the big yard built up there at Hog Island, where it was necessary to use dynamite to open a hole for every pile that was driven, and enormous expense was incurred everywhere; and yet they compare this bill to that. Why, in the name of common sense, do they not take up a fair comparison? Why do they not mention the Grain Corporation? It functioned pretty well; it was organized to handle grain. This corporation is to handle grain of various and sundry kinds.

I recollect very well that the Grain Corporation was supposed to be wonderfully well handled. Mr. Julius Barnes, from the great State of Minnesota, was the head of the Grain Corporation, and he reported having earned $80,000,000. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] said this morning: "Of course it is no trouble to earn $80,000,000 if you fix the price of what you buy, and then fix the price of the commodity that you sell." Be that as it may—and I am not going to go into a discussion of the grain situation, for it is too complicated—here was one Government institution which functioned very nicely, and turned over $80,000,000 to the Government. It is true that Mr. Hoover borrowed $60,000,000 of that from Mr. Barnes, and bought grain for some suffering people, I believe, over in Poland, and they probably owe him the money on it yet, so we have not the $80,000,000; but it was earned nevertheless.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. RANDELL. I yield to the Senator if he wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I just wish to correct the Senator. Mr. Hoover did not borrow $50,000,000. The Congress authorized the Grain Corporation to sell $50,000,000 worth of flour to the suffering peoples in Europe and to take any credit they could get, as a matter of charity.

Mr. RANDELL. That was on the suggestion of Mr. Hoover, though, was it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know whether Mr. Hoover suggested it or not.

Mr. RANDELL. I think Mr. Hoover suggested it; let us give him credit for it. He does not get as much credit on this floor as he is entitled to. I want to give him some.

Mr. KELLOGG. How much of that has been collected by the Government, I am unable to say. It was a charitable transaction and was authorized by the Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. RANDELL. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be very appropriate at this point to suggest that all of this profit of $80,000,000 made by the Grain Corporation came out of the farmers of this country.

Mr. RANDELL. That is true. I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. And it ought, it seems to me, to constitute an appealing argument when some legislation is attempted in their behalf.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; and several hundred millions more came out of the farmers of this country in prices they could have gotten for their grain if the market had not been interfered with.

Mr. RANDELL. But did not Congress fix the price of that grain?

Mr. KELLOGG. The President fixed it.

Mr. RANDELL. Congress passed a law on the subject, anyhow; but I am not going into that matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. Congress fixed the minimum, and the President fixed both the minimum and the maximum.

Mr. RANDELL. Well, all right. We gave him the authority; but I will not take time on that.

There is another little agricultural corporation which seems to have escaped the attention of Senators—the Sugar Equalization Board. Most of you have not any sugar up in your States, and perhaps you do not take sugar in yours, but I do in mine when I can get it. The Sugar Equalization Board was a Government corporation. I think there were seven men appointed by the President. It functioned very well. It cleaned up $39,000,000, which went into the Treasury of Uncle Sam. One of the Senators suggests they cleaned up the sugar-growers. If the advice of the Sugar Equalization Board had been taken by the late chief of my party, and the Cuban crop of 1920 had been bought at between 6 and 7 cents a pound, as they wanted to have it bought, we would not have paid what we did pay for sugar; but I am not going to go into that now. I am just trying to remind you that here was a board organized to handle one farm product. It functioned magnificently, and caused the American people to get very much cheaper sugar than they would have gotten otherwise. They used up the sugar growers, as the Senator from Arkansas suggests, but they benefited the great mass of the American people. If we can judge by these two precedents—the Grain Corporation and the Sugar Equalization Board—I imagine that this corporation of three men provided by the Norris bill would do pretty well.

Senators, most of us are lawyers. Most of us want precedents. Most of us can not adopt anything unless we can point to some time in the history of the world when somebody else did likewise. I have given you two precedents, the Grain Corporation and the Sugar Equalization Board, which are pretty nearly the same thing. They furnish precedents to you gentlemen of legal minds who want precedents to point to.

I have held the Senate too long, Mr. President. There are other things I should like to say, but I wish to conclude by stating it as my firm conviction that this legislation, or something very similar to it, something along the same lines, something intended to carry out the same purposes, is necessary to protect American agriculture.

I thank the Senate.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he sits down. He told the Senate, earlier in his address, that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had determined upon one amendment to the bill as reported. Are there other amendments?

Mr. RANDELL. Yes, sir; I think there are two or three. I answered the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] about them.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator has those amendments, I should be glad to have them.

Mr. RANDELL. I think I can tell the Senator what they are.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a new print of the bill has been authorized, and a copy of it will be on the Senator's desk in the morning.

Mr. McCORMICK. Carrying the amendments which the committee has made to its own bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, just a suggestion.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The substitute bill that has been offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has been printed, and just a few moments ago a copy of it was placed in my hands. Of course I shall not have the opportunity or time to analyze that bill now; but almost at a glance it has occurred to me that every criticism that I recollect that has been made against the pending bill is multiplied in the substitute bill, and before the debate is over, when I can get the time, I expect to analyze it and show that to the Senate. With perhaps one exception, as I glance through it, there has not been, in my judgment, an evil pointed out or a criticism made but that you will find it duplicated in the substitute. It is covered up in an indirect way, but it is there.

Before the Senator from Kansas makes a motion to go into executive session, I understand that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] desires to get up his resolution.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I should like to call up again to-day the resolution to which objection was made on yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before we get off the subject that is now before the Senate, the President's message has been delivered to the Senate, and about twenty times as much of that message is taken up in discussion of the railroads and advancements to the railroads as is taken up in a discussion of the farmers and their necessities. In examining the message I find that about 2 inches of it pertains to agricultural conditions and asks for some relief touching them, and the balance of the message is devoted to the railroads.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator ought to realize that in various methods, by the grapevine route, it has percolated through that originally the substitute that has been offered to-day was intended to include relief for the railroads; and I presume the message was written while that program had been developed that far and was unchanged.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I think without any question that must be true.

Mr. NORRIS. But evidently after the message was written they discovered that it was necessary to eliminate that from the substitute, at least until after it had been agreed to, in order to get enough votes to defeat the other bill; so I hope the Senator will not offer any criticism.

Mr. HARRISON. It was not in a spirit of criticism that I said what I did. I just want to know in what direction we are traveling. I imagined, from what we have seen in the papers, that the substitute would embody some legislation to take care of the railroad situation. While the program named in the message is a simple one, and they say that it will incur no obligation on the part of the Government, it will take no appropriation, it will cost the Government nothing, surely if what the President has urged is carried out in legislation it will mean that the railroads will borrow about $500,000,000 from the War Finance Corporation. In view of what we have seen in the papers, and the urgent appeal of the President, and the general submissiveness of some gentlemen to the wishes of the President, I am wondering if this is the only amendment that will be offered to the Norris bill—whether there is another amendment coming up, which will receive the united support of the administration forces, to take care of the railroad proposition in this bill. I knew that the Senator from Nebraska would not know anything about it, because evidently they have ignored him in this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator that it is hardly fair that he should ask his question in the Senate. Probably Senators do not know yet. That is decided outside of the Senate, and when it is decided it will be worked in here in some way.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the question for the present.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I simply want to offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it take the usual course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President—

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois, if his matter will take no time.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if there be no debate, or no lengthy debate, I should like to call up, subject to unanimous consent, Senate resolution 112, providing for the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the occupation and administration of the territories of the Republic of Haiti and the Dominican Republic by the forces of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not call up that resolution to-day. I want to talk to him a little about it before it is brought up in the Senate. I may not have any objection to it, but I would rather he would not call it up to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that the Senator from Washington objects.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, no request has been made to lay aside the unfinished business, and under the circumstances there is no use of making that request, because objection is going to be made to the present consideration of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Illinois.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 2301) granting the consent of Congress to Old Trail's Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, and I submit a report (No. 235) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, in line 7, after the word "at" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "or near the foot of Main Street, of," and in line 9, after the word "Missouri," in line 8, to strike out "two thousand four hundred and eighty feet downstream from the present location of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway bridge across said stream at said point," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Old Trail's Bridge Co. (a Missouri corporation) and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at the city of Boonville, Mo., in the county of Cooper, in the State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 27, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 26, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O our eternal Father, Thou art all wise and almighty and nothing is impossible with Thee. Along the pathway on which we move forth Thou dost show Thy power and mercy. The pillars of Thy throne are truth and righteousness, yet Thou art pitying like a father and comforting as a mother. As the conflict is great, give increasing success and strength to goodness and break the right arm of evil. O may we rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him. Give comfort to any heart sitting at the hearthstone asking the reason of an empty chair. Console any who may be murmuring in the darkness of grief. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EDNA DUCE AND ETHEL MASON.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 127.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Edna Duce the sum of $153.33 and to Ethel Mason the sum of $153.33, being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late Hon. William E. Mason at the time of his death, June 17, 1921.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution for the employees of a deceased Member, and the record in the matter has been verified. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTE TELEPHONE OPERATORS.

Mr. IRELAND. I ask consideration for the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 138.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House compensation at the rate of $3 per diem each for the services of three substitute telephone operators during the remainder of the present session, including the compensation of one substitute telephone operator during the month of June, 1921.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it has been found necessary during the heated season to employ additional substitute operators at the switchboard. Illness during the heated weather has disabled many of them, and this has been found necessary and is recommended by the chief operator and the Clerk of the House. I shall make a further reference to this in another resolution, which I shall offer within a short time.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

EXPENSES OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REORGANIZATION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of this resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 151.

Resolved, That pursuant to the authority contained in the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to create a Joint Committee on the Reorganization of the Administrative Branch of the Government" (Public resolution No. 54, 66th Cong.), and in the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a representative of the Executive to cooperate with the Joint Committee on Reorganization" (Public resolution No. 1, 67th Cong.), there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House one-half of the expense of said Joint Committee on Reorganization, upon vouchers countersigned by the chairman of the said committee on the part of the House and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that resolution.

Mr. GARNER. You will have to have a quorum to pass it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The salary of the man appointed by the President, and who was subsequently elected chairman of the committee, is not going to be paid out of the contingent fund of either House if I can prevent it. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that resolution.

Mr. IRELAND. What were the provisions of the two resolutions on which this was based?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will make the point of order it is not privileged—no; I will withdraw that and we will come to the straight issue on it.

Mr. IRELAND. This is my understanding—

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, pending that I will make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman from Arkansas would restrain himself for a few minutes.

Mr. IRELAND. Will the gentleman withhold—

Mr. WINGO. It requires a good deal of restraint to do so, but at the request of the gentleman from Tennessee I will do it.

Mr. IRELAND. This is my understanding of the matter. The first resolution passed creating this Joint Committee on Reorganization was later amended by a second resolution embodying the appointment of a representative of the Executive. It was my understanding at that time that the expenses of this commission or committee were to be paid out of the contingent funds of the House and Senate, one-half each. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Substantially so.

Mr. IRELAND. This resolution is simply to make that workable. There was a provision in the second resolution, or the first, I do not recall accurately from memory, that made it necessary that no expense of the commission be paid without further action of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I know some of us would like—may I offer this suggestion—

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That the gentleman reserve this—

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I now call the attention of the Speaker to the fact and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-one Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have a well-defined suspicion that there is a grave possibility the House will not find itself in happy accord on this resolution, or, at least, there may be some slight differences of opinion expressed. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that I may temporarily withdraw the resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw it.

Mr. REAVIS. I hope the gentleman will not do that. We are very greatly embarrassed.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any other resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. I ask consideration of the resolution—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Was that resolution withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

TELEPHONE OPERATORS IN CAPITOL.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 25.

Resolved, etc. That there shall be paid, out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $100 per month each for the services of telephone operators in the Capitol telephone exchange, seven in the employ of the Senate and nine annual and three session in the employ of the House; and for the services of a chief operator at compensation at the rate of $150 per month: Provided, That such employments shall be in lieu of a like number of telephone operators now authorized and provided in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 3, 1921.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is the resolution that I referred to a short time ago when we passed the one for temporary substitute operators. It has been brought about by the largely increased service that the Capitol switchboard renders and the inability of the manager or the chief operator to secure bright, keen, quick-witted young ladies without the provision for training that the commercial telephone companies offer to employ on the Capitol force. This raises their salary somewhat. It is a substantial raise, but it is found necessary, and I think the majority will agree that it is justified. These girls are on duty for unusually long hours and their work is very difficult. They have to be far above the average telephone operator in ability. They must not only be good telephone operators but they must memorize the list of the Members and officers of the House, so that they can call by name rather than number, as most of us do, and this makes their work additionally difficult. During the heated period they have had quite a bit of illness on the force, largely because of the confining nature of the work, and it has been next to impossible for the manager to keep the force intact and give adequate service to the House and Senate and Capitol Buildings.

I am very glad to say that this report received the unanimous approval of the committee present. These girls answer about 2,500 calls each a day, perhaps 400 an hour, which must be surprising to all of us. If there is any other information desired, I will be glad to give such as I have at hand. This raises their salaries just slightly above the rate paid by the commercial companies for like services, and gives the manager $1,800 a year instead of $1,500. The assistant manager and another operator are appointed by the Superintendent of the Capitol, and I am led to believe that a corresponding proportional increase will be given the assistant chief operator.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman says that two of them are appointed by the Superintendent of the Capitol. How are the others appointed?

Mr. IRELAND. There are nine annual operators appointed by the House, and three session operators; eight by the Senate, and there is a provision for certain substitutes—I think one on each side. I am not positive about that. Two are appointed by the Superintendent of the Capitol, one of which is assistant chief operator.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. What do the operators receive now?

Mr. IRELAND. Seventy-five dollars a month.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. What do they get by this resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. One hundred dollars.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. DYER. They get the bonus, also, do they not?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to say this, that anyone who has had experience with telephone operators must be impressed with the fact that these operators in the Capitol are giving very exceptional service.

Mr. IRELAND. They certainly are. It is the most wonderful telephone service in the world.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The question is on the passage of the House concurrent resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

THE HOUSE LIBRARY.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 152.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to make a survey and classification of the books and documents in the House Library and of the reserve stock stored in the House Office Building, and to dispose of such excess volumes through the Superintendent of Documents, as provided by law, as, in the judgment of the Clerk, the Librarian of Congress, and the chairman of the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, may not be necessary as a reserve library with which to supply the Hall Library. And the Clerk is further directed, in conjunction with the Architect of the Capitol, to remove the contents of the rooms now occupied by the House Library, and to refit and make ready said rooms for the occupancy of the journal clerk, tally clerk, chief bill clerk, enrolling clerk, and their respective assistants, and of such other employees of the Clerk's office as may therein be accommodated. All expenses in connection with the execution of this resolution, including labor, additional clerical assistance, and equipment not exceeding $25,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman presenting that as a privileged resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that it is not a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order that the resolution is not privileged. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. IRELAND. Will the gentleman from Tennessee withhold the point of order temporarily?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will reserve it.

Mr. IRELAND. This, if I may have the gentleman's attention, is what is sought to be done by this resolution:

The congestion in the accommodations of the Capitol, which is apparent and within the knowledge of every Member, seems to have pointed this route as the best solution for that congested condition. The rooms are under the assignment of the Speaker, and the only place found for the journal clerk, bill clerk, and so forth, is in this room on the lower corridor, where the ventilation, light, and air are very bad, and if we had to put in our time there all day, as they do, I do not think we would find it comfortable or healthful. In conjunction with this it was thought that by augmenting the small library here in the House and transferring this library to the House Office Building it would prove of a greater convenience to the vast majority of Members and would not inconvenience anyone by reason of the transfer, and it would give well-ventilated, well-lighted, and commodious quarters to these boys that are in the employ of the Clerk. It seemed the best solution, and it is the best thought of the men about the Capitol who have been consulted about it, and who thought that possibly by this method we might ultimately find additional quarters in connection with the change in the rest of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there are quite a number of Members of the House who are not chairmen of committees who have offices in the Capitol Building. I have no objection to their having offices here, but if they did not have them, if they were in a situation where they were associated with us in rooms in the House Office Building, could not this space, or the space now occupied by them, be utilized for these matters without the expense that is involved in this resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. I hardly think so. We have canvassed that situation. By the way, I do not believe there is a single available room in the House Office Building at present which is habitable. The necessitated increase of accommodations for the enlarged Committee on Appropriations also entered into this proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To that I think there would be no objection, if that were brought in alone—that matter of the Committee on Appropriations. But the trouble of it is that it seems hard to consider doing something or having something done that is right without doing something wrong in connection with it.

Mr. IRELAND. That is so. But this seemed to be the best thought we could secure on the situation. The question to be decided by the membership, it seems to me, is whether they will be greatly inconvenienced by the removal of this library to the House Office Building or whether they would not in reality receive a greater accommodation for the majority of the membership by the removal. It will enable us to do several things in the Capitol here that the membership will later on find advantageous, I am sure. Much hinges on this one move.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think this shifting around will cost the sum of $25,000, which is estimated for in the gentleman's resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Hardly; but it was very difficult to arrive at an estimate that was accurate, and our time was so short that we placed that figure as the outside sum. It will probably be under $20,000.

Mr. BLANTON. What is it about this shifting that is going to cost even several thousand dollars?

Mr. IRELAND. I can only give you the benefit of such advice as we have received on it.

Mr. BLANTON. Moving books is not very expensive.

Mr. IRELAND. No; but we must realize that there are a lot of filing cases where the anchorage to the floor must be removed and replaced, and several things entering into it make the amount of cost seem unreasonable. I hope they will be held down.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman kindly identify more particularly the spaces in the Capitol that are referred to in the terms of this resolution? I doubt if many of us are carrying in our minds quite accurately what offices the gentleman means. He does not, of course, mean this reference library here?

Mr. IRELAND. No; that would not be disturbed. It would simply be augmented.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman please identify more particularly the other rooms affected by the resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. There are none affected except the library directly on the floor above here. That is the only one that would be vacated by this move; but the idea is to put the bill clerks, the journal clerk, and the clerks in the office of the Clerk, and in all probability the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and provide accommodations for further clerical force up there from other departments.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And put all those people on the first floor up here in the library space?

Mr. IRELAND. Exactly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say it was contemplated moving the books in this library to the House Office Building?

Mr. IRELAND. That was the thought.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say awhile ago that there were not any rooms in the House Office Building available to those who occupy offices in the Capitol.

Mr. IRELAND. I am told that there are rooms over there that might be available that would not be sufficiently light or well ventilated; for instance, vacant rooms that might be used for the time one would be in the library, but which people would not want to occupy continuously as an office. That was the hope, to get around that objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If we could save, as my colleague from Tennessee suggested, $20,000 or $25,000 by continuing to utilize the Capitol for this library purpose, where, I beg to say to the gentleman, it would be more convenient to Members, because many Members while the House is in session go to the library upstairs for the purpose of quickly looking up information—if we could save $20,000 or $25,000 possibly, as my colleague suggested, by having a few of our colleagues associated with us in the House Office Building who now have offices here in the Capitol, it would be a proposition of economy that ought to commend itself to the membership.

Mr. IRELAND. How often does the gentleman use the library here?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have been up there several times. I do not make a daily habit of it, but on several occasions I have gone up there to get records or have some matters looked up. I think I would do it here more than I would in the House Office Building.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not true that the test of a library above all things is not what is in it but where it is when you want it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and I will say this to my friend from Vermont, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, that if you put this library over in some basement office or room in the House Office Building, as suggested, it will be of little use, because it would hardly be available, and certainly not convenient—

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does not the gentleman think that the fact that this library is so close here is the thing that makes it a reference library, while we who happen to be in the House Office Building can get more quickly to the Library of Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Another thing that I want to ask the gentleman about: Of course, the gentleman and his committee did not come in here and arbitrarily fix the sum at $25,000 unless they had thought the cost would be in that neighborhood. It strikes me as rather amazing. I can not conceive upon what facts the gentleman based his estimate of $25,000. There are no books to be bought?

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, no. It is on the physical work of the building.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It seems to me that sum would be a good start to build another library.

Mr. IRELAND. I confess I was surprised by the figure. But that economy may be used in the removal the gentleman may be certain.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. KINCHELOE. I wanted to ask why we should remove this library at all?

Mr. PADGETT. I wanted to ask a question somewhat collateral, as a result of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. He said there was no room now available in the House Office Building for Members who are housed in the Capitol Building.

Mr. IRELAND. No room is available for Members' offices. I am so informed.

Mr. PADGETT. If that is true with the present membership of the House, what will be the situation if the membership is increased to 460 instead of 435, as it now is?

Mr. BLANTON. We will be in a devil of a jam.

Mr. IRELAND. I agree with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois to what space in the House Office Building it is proposed to remove this library?

Mr. IRELAND. I do not recall from memory. The Clerk can give the gentleman that information.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Can the gentleman tell us about how many Members of the House are accommodated with offices in the Capitol?

Mr. IRELAND. No; I can not, but I should hazard the guess that perhaps there are from 16 to 20.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. STEAGALL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that $25,000 is the estimate submitted to the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. IRELAND. That is an outside figure.

Mr. STEAGALL. That would be authorized by the resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; but only so much of it will be used as is needed.

Mr. STEAGALL. Would it not be better to have a request for $100,000 and then adopt a resolution providing $25,000, so that we could report to the country that we had saved $75,000 while we were doing this?

Mr. IRELAND. Evidently the gentleman has not the confidence in the economic methods of the Committee on Accounts that the committee has in itself.

Mr. STEAGALL. But we are saving a great deal of money by that process. Every now and then we have estimates sent in for large amounts, and we appropriate less than the amount estimated, and then we report to the country how much we have saved.

Mr. IRELAND. That may be.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. IRELAND. I shall be glad to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the regular order. The regular order is the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am still willing to reserve the point of order; but if the regular order is demanded I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state his point of order?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That this is not a privileged resolution. It clothes the Clerk of the House with authority that he does not now have either under the law or the rules of the House. It brings into the determination of what is probably a legislative question the chairman of the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers. It does not bring in the committee, but just the chairman. Then it directs the Clerk further, in conjunction with the Architect of the Capitol, to remove the contents of the rooms now occupied by the House library. The Clerk has no jurisdiction over the House library. It directs him to refit and make ready said rooms. The Clerk of the House has no jurisdiction under the law over the matter of refitting the rooms.

The SPEAKER. It has been held in a number of cases that matters pertaining to the convenience of the House are privileged matters. It is a question with the Chair as to whether this would not come under that rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, that is true if the resolutions are presented in the right way, and not undertaking to confer authority upon somebody who has no authority under the law, or even under the rules of the House.

Mr. IRELAND. I submit that this resolution makes certain provisions for the payment of necessary expenses out of the contingent fund of the House, which gives the resolution its privileged status. I submit that the other is an incidental and immaterial matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Take, for instance, one of the first items in this resolution, which authorizes the Clerk to make a survey and classification of books and documents in the House library and of the reserve stock stored in the House Office Building. I take it that is the reserve from the document or folding rooms.

The SPEAKER. The only ground the Chair sees for it is that this library is for the convenience of the Members, and the question in the mind of the Chair is whether it is not proper in providing for the convenience and privileges of the Members of the House to make such disposition as is necessary of these books and of the rooms. The Chair is not entirely certain about it, and would be glad to hear any statement that the gentleman desires to make about it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does the language—

And to dispose of such excess volumes through the Superintendent of Documents—mean? That is, beginning in lines 4 and 5.

Mr. IRELAND. I beg the gentleman's pardon. What was that question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Beginning in line 4 the resolution contains the language—

And to dispose of such excess volumes through the Superintendent of Documents.

The SPEAKER. The Superintendent of Documents is authorized now by law to dispose of books that are not necessary, and the Chair supposes it is intended that under the jurisdiction of the House he should exercise the same right. All that gives this matter privilege is the fact that these are our own books.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes, indeed.

Mr. MANN. Does not the law provide that certain documents shall be delivered to the Clerk of the House for distribution in certain ways, and is not the reserve stock stored in the House Office Building a part of these documents, so that the law now provides how they shall be distributed?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that they have to be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; this has nothing to do with the folding room. Committees get various documents, and they get them through the Clerk of the House. I am not sure. I am asking for information as to whether the Clerk having received these documents under the law is then at liberty to turn around and hand them over to the Superintendent of Documents to be sold or given away, or whether he is obliged by law to follow a prescribed course.

If it was permissible for the Clerk to enter into the discussion he could give the information, for he knows.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question? If he obtained them in accordance with law, does the gentleman from Illinois think that by a simple House resolution we could authorize him to distribute them in a manner not in accordance with law?

Mr. MANN. If the law prescribed what should be done with them I do not think by a House resolution we could change the law. It would be perfectly plain that the House could not change the law by a simple House resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, while I assume that the purpose of this resolution is for the convenience of Members of the House—

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The gentleman is so important and would not give others a chance to speak that I think there should be a quorum here to hear him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point that there is no quorum present. It is obvious that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-one Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the point of order I made, I ventured to direct the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers is not a committee created by the rules of the House alone. It is a committee created by statute.

Mr. IRELAND. The committee is not involved in this; it is simply the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is precisely it. This resolution undertakes to confer upon the chairman of the committee created not alone by the rules of the House but by law the functions which ought to be performed by the full committee, if performed at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is somewhat perplexed by this proposition. It has been held in a number of cases that a proposition relating to the convenience of Members of the House is privileged, such as the building of elevators, and so forth. But the right to dispose of documents is provided by law, and this does seem to change it by saying that the Clerk shall dispose of them, not as now but with the concurrence of the chairman of the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers and the Librarian of Congress. It seems to the Chair that that does change the power the Clerk now has by law, and so the point of order is sustained.

THE RAILROADS AND AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It is necessary to call the attention of Congress to the obligations of the Government to the railroads, and ask your co-operation in order to enable the Government to discharge these obligations. There is nothing new about them, but only recently has there come an understanding which seems well to justify a sincere endeavor to effect an early settlement. These obligations already have been recognized by the Congress, in the passage of the transportation act restoring the railroads to their owners, but previous recognition was made in the contract under which the railroads were operated by the Government for the period of the World War.

The contract covering operation provided that the railways should be returned to their owners in as good condition as when taken over by the Government, and the transportation act, recognizing that betterments and additions belong to capital account, provided that such sums as the railway companies owed the Government for betterments and new equipment, added during the period of Government operation, might be funded. There has been, at no time, any question about the justice of funding such indebtedness to the Government. Indeed, it has been in progress to a measurable degree ever since the return of the railroads to their owners. It has been limited, however, to such cases as those in which final settlements with the Railway Administration have been effected. The process is admittedly too slow to meet the difficult situation which the owners of the railroads have been facing, and I believe it essential to restore railway activities and essential to the country's good fortune to hasten both funding and settlement.

Quite apart from the large sums owing to the Government, which we are morally and legally bound to fund, the Government admittedly owes the railway companies large sums on various accounts, such as compensation, depreciation, and maintenance. There has been a wide difference of opinion relating to the amount the Government owes, due in the main to the claim of the owners that in spite of materials and hours of labor being estimated in proper relations to similar expenditure in the prewar test period, the "inefficiency of labor" still left a wide difference between actual upkeep and the expenditure made during the Government operation.

In order to expedite settlement and funding an informal understanding, which is all that is possible or practical, has been reached, under which the railway claims based on the "inefficiency of labor" are to be waived to hasten complete and final settlements, without surrender of any rights in court in case there is failure to settle. I have no doubt that early, final, and satisfactory settlements will be reached, since the policy of the Railway Administration already has been effective in finally settling the accounts of roads filing claims amounting to $225,568,764, resulting in the payment to them of $68,141,222.

The way now would seem to be clear to very early adjustment and relief, except for the fact that the Railway Administration, though possessing assets, does not command the funds necessary to meet what will be its admitted obligations.

There is no thought to ask Congress for additional funds. Perhaps $500,000,000 will be necessary. The Railroad Administration has, or will have in the progress of funding, ample securities to meet all requirements if Congress only will grant the authority to negotiate these securities and provide the agency for their negotiation.

With this end in view you are asked to extend the authority of the War Finance Corporation so that it may purchase these railway funding securities accepted by the Director General of Railroads. No added expense, no added investment is required on the part of the Government, there is no added liability, no added tax burden. It is merely the grant of authority necessary to enable a most useful and efficient Government agency to use its available funds to purchase securities for which Congress already has authorized the issue, and turn them into the channels of finance ready to float them.

I can readily believe that so simple a remedy will have your prompt sanction. The question of our obligation can not be raised, the wisdom of affording early relief is not to be doubted, and the avoidance of added appropriation or liability will appeal to Congress and the public alike.

The after-war distresses of two great and fundamental activities have been riveting the anxious attention of the country. One is the readjustment and restoration of agriculture, the other is the distress of our railway transportation system.

Pending proposals for relief and their discussion have already brought to the attention of Congress the very promising possibilities of broadening the powers of the War Finance Corporation for the further relief of agriculture and live-stock production. This corporation has proven itself so helpful in the relief thus far undertaken, that I can not help but believe that its broadened powers, as have been proposed, to meet agricultural needs, will enable it wholly to meet the nation-wide emergency. This is an impelling moral obligation to American farming in all its larger aspects, and it will be most gratifying to have your early sanction.

In the case of the railroads there is a moral and a contractual obligation, and your favorable action is no less urgent, and will no less appeal to public approval. Railway solvency and efficiency are essential to our healthful industrial, commercial, and agricultural life. Everything hinges on transportation.

After necessary and drastic curtailments, after harrowing straits in meeting their financial difficulties, the railways need only this financial aid which the fulfillment of our obligations will bestow, to inaugurate their far-reaching revival. Its effects will be felt in varied industries, and will banish to a large degree the depression which, though inevitable in war's aftermath, we are all so anxious to see ended.

I am appending herewith memoranda concerning the progress of railroad liquidation and revealing existing conditions which Congress will be interested to note, while considering the simple remedy proposed for the relief of the situation. The information is submitted by the Director General of the Railroads.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 26, 1921.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON REORGANIZATION.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution 151, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 151.

Resolved, That pursuant to the authority contained in the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to create a Joint Committee on the Reorganization of the Administrative Branch of the Government" (Pub. Res. No. 54, 66th Cong.), and in the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a representative of the Executive to cooperate with the Joint Committee on Reorganization" (Pub. Res. No. 1, 67th Cong.), there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House one-half of the expense of said Joint Committee on Reorganization, upon vouchers countersigned by the chairman of the said committee on the part of the House and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 53, noes 83.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 161, answered "present" 1, not voting 191, as follows:

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and I would like to know if he voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HICKS). He did not vote. Mr. COLLIER. I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. COLLIER was called and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish to express regret and some surprise that this resolution has excited the antagonism that is so apparent. It seems to me perfectly harmless in nature and one that is inspired solely by a desire to facilitate the work of the committee. The Committee on Reorganization, which has now been functioning for some time and working with more or less regularity, was appointed under authority of a resolution passed in the Sixty-sixth Congress, which authorized, among other things, the committee to employ assistants, to fix salaries, and to provide for the payment of salaries out of the contingent funds of the House and the Senate by resolutions passed by those bodies, the language being as follows:

Such expenditures to be paid in equal parts from the contingent funds of the House of Representatives and the Senate as from time to time may be duly authorized by resolution of those bodies.

In another portion of the resolution the committee is empowered to employ such assistants as it requires at such salaries as the committee may deem reasonable. Subsequent to the passage of this resolution another resolution with reference to the activity of this committee was passed by the House in the Sixty-seventh Congress, which authorized the appointment of a representative of the Executive to cooperate with this committee, fixing his salary at $7,500 a year, payable monthly, and provided for payment in harmony with the provisions of the original resolution; that is to say, by resolutions passed by the House and the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman thus appointed now the chairman of the committee?

Mr. REAVIS. He is acting chairman of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Who is chairman of the committee?

Mr. REAVIS. The acting chairman of the committee is Mr. Walter Brown, the representative of the Executive.

Mr. WALSH. Who was chairman of the committee?

Mr. REAVIS. There are separate chairmen, a chairman of the Senate side and a chairman of the House side, and Mr. Walter Brown, representing the Executive, presides over the meetings of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Under what authority is a person not named a member of this joint committee made chairman of the committee?

Mr. REAVIS. He was made under the authority of a vote of the committee. Let me say in this connection that the representative of the Executive has no vote in this committee. He has never sought the right and has no right under the resolution to participate in the deliberations of this committee except to preside over its sessions and assist the committee in reference to its work outside.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. In one moment. I want to say this for Mr. Brown, and I am very glad of the opportunity of saying it: When the resolution was first presented to me with reference to the employment of a representative of the Executive I was not entirely in accord with it, but after the matter was brought more fully to my attention and the necessity for this appointment disclosed, I became more amenable to the suggestion. Mr. Brown, of Toledo, Ohio, the representative of the Executive on this committee, left a law business of very large proportions to come down here for the purpose of serving his country in any way that he could. It is no secret that he was offered the ambassadorship to Japan, and that he replied he wanted no job; but if there was some way he could serve his country, if he could be of beneficial service in these days of reconstruction, he would accept the opportunity. He has been working since the 6th of May, not in the front pages of the newspaper, not looking for notoriety or newspaper publicity, but, I say to you, after being intimately familiar with his service, that there is no man working for the Government to-day who has given greater service to his country than this self-same Walter F. Brown. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. What is he doing?

Mr. REAVIS. I will tell the gentleman what he is doing, and I am glad the gentleman asked the question. With infinite patience, with courage, and with signal ability he has gone through the various ramifications of this Government, he has gone into the many activities of this Government where there is duplication, such as the constant competition between the War and Navy Departments, such as the competition in the Consular Service in the State Department and the representatives abroad of the Commerce Department, he has not only seen the necessity, by reason of unusual mental attainments, of the coordination of those things, but with courage and with patience he has gone to the heads of these departments as the representative of President Harding, speaking the voice of the Executive, and has nearly completed, with the assistance of this committee, a plan of reorganization which I believe this House will unanimously indorse, and because of his labor and tact will encounter no contest in any department of the Government.

I can not go into the various details of what he is doing—I have not the time—but since the 6th of May down to this good hour he has been employed long hours day after day performing a national service more beneficial than the service of any other man of whom I now know.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that within a day or two after the head of the budget system was brought here a chart was demanded by Mr. Brown as to where they could cut out this and that, one of the early pieces of work, and how long it would take to do it?

Mr. REAVIS. It is quite impossible for me to estimate it, but I do know this, that many of the things that have appeared in the newspapers as to economy in other branches of this Government for which men are taking credit have resulted because of the work of this committee and Mr. Brown. He has claimed no credit nor has he sought newspaper publicity.

Now, let me revert to the purpose of this resolution. The resolution now before the House will not cost the country a dollar. It does not provide for the expenditure of a penny, but it does provide that instead of being compelled to come to the House or to the Senate with a resolution asking for the payment of the salaries of the employees of this committee, as the two original resolutions provided, these expenses may be paid upon vouchers and orders signed by myself as the chairman of the House committee and the other half paid by the Senate under a Senate joint resolution, upon order signed by Senator Smoot as chairman of the Senate committee. It is merely a matter of convenience. Mr. Brown, under employment by virtue of the resolution passed by this House, has been working since the 6th of May without the payment of a dollar, because we have had no opportunity to get in here with resolutions to pay these salaries. We have a stenographer and a secretary, or clerk, of the committee, neither one of whom has drawn a penny, and it may be interesting to you to know that their salaries have been paid out of the pocket of Mr. Brown because we could not get these resolutions passed. Now, it is merely a matter of convenience to provide for the payment of the help of this committee, not by coming in every two weeks, as under our contract with the stenographer we would have to come in, with a resolution and take up the time of the House in the consideration of it, but to pay it out of the contingent fund of the House on a voucher signed by myself.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. MANN. The original resolution provided, as I understand the gentleman has indicated, for the payment of these by vote of the House?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Has such a resolution as that been introduced at any time?

Mr. REAVIS. There has not.

Mr. MANN. It has been two months, and the committee has wholly disregarded that provision of the original resolution.

Mr. REAVIS. The committee has not disregarded it, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It has not acted upon it.

Mr. REAVIS. The matter has been the subject of conversation several times as to when time could be given for resolutions of that kind, and we thought as a matter of convenience, if the House would authorize this committee, as it authorizes practically every other committee doing the same character of work, to pay on an order signed by the chairman. It would relieve us of the necessity of coming here every two weeks or every month with a resolution providing for the payment of salaries.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman himself introduced the resolution which was passed. Why did you put that provision in if you did not mean it?

Mr. REAVIS. I put that provision in for this reason: The resolution as introduced by me had been passed by the Senate. I put in a copy of the Senate resolution after a conference with those interested in the proposition on that side, with the idea of economizing in time.

Mr. MANN. I was in hopes the gentleman was for the resolution he introduced.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman has no right to assume I was not for it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he is only for it because it was as it passed the Senate.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman will pardon me. I did not say anything of the kind. The principle of the Senate resolution provided for the thing I desired. Some of the details, probably, I might have wished some other way, but to secure the principle with the least possible expenditure of time I introduced in this House a copy of the Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman give me a little time?

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to, ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] to yield to me three minutes more.

Mr. IRELAND. I yield to the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. I want to say further to the House that notwithstanding this committee has done a great deal of work, and I think a great deal of valuable work, with which I hope you will largely agree when the report is made to the House, the total expenditure of the committee, outside of the salary of the representative of the Executive, since it started to function in the early days of May, has been less than $200. The stenographer and the clerk of the committee would neither have received a dollar had it not been that Mr. Brown took care of it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman care to indicate when this joint committee may submit some recommendation for the action of the House?

Mr. REAVIS. That is rather difficult; but I will say this, that I think a complete plan will be before the committee for its consideration in probably the next two or three weeks. There will be some hearings on that plan, because the members of the committee are not entirely in accord with some of the provisions made in the plan. There may be short hearings on it, but I am hoping that we will soon get it before the House for its consideration. The exact time I would not pretend to state.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will yield.

Mr. MONDELL. The manner of payment now provided is the manner of payment usually provided for expenses of committees of the House?

Mr. REAVIS. There may be exceptions, but none has been called to my attention. The manner called for in this resolution is the manner that has always been provided for every committee doing similar work, so far as I know, during my service in Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. In just a moment.

Now, we made the agreement with Mr. Brown. We passed a resolution fixing his salary and the manner of payment. Under that resolution and under that agreement he left his business in Toledo and is now in Washington doing the very serviceable work I have indicated. I do not think that this House in honor can refuse to abide by its contract.

Mr. BLANTON. Just after the gentleman was appointed on this committee, in a speech on the floor he promised the House that the committee was going to do its best to get rid of the surplus employees here in Washington, and I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we still have about 87,000 of them on the pay roll, and even Mr. Brown from Ohio, sitting here, has not been able to get rid of any of them.

Mr. REAVIS. One of the reasons why that is so is because this committee is unable to function as it should. For two years I have been advocating the appointment and the activity of this committee as a business proposition, and I have never come on the floor of the House on this proposition, entirely alien as it is to any partisanship or any politics, that that side has not engaged in filibuster.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to challenge the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. He said Mr. Brown had been here for some time and no clerks had been discharged. I want to say in a bureau of the War Department there were employed on the 1st of July, 1920, 2,200 clerks. On the 1st day of this month in the same bureau there were employed 202 clerks.

Mr. BLANTON. But they are employed in other departments. They are on other pay rolls. They have not yet been gotten rid of.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not yield, Mr. Speaker, to any further controversy between gentlemen.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The War Department discharged 1,900 clerks on the 1st of July.

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; and I say the Department of Justice had effected a saving of $400,000 by the discharge of clerks. But this committee has had nothing to do with it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, would not the gentleman be willing for me to be recognized in my own right for an hour, with the right reserved to him to move the previous question?

Mr. IRELAND. I think that would be unreasonable.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield me some time?

Mr. IRELAND. Would 10 minutes be sufficient?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Ten minutes would be entirely sufficient to me personally, but there are some other gentlemen on this side to whom I hope the gentleman will yield?

Mr. IRELAND. We will see to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, some wonder was expressed when the resolution, authorizing the President to appoint what is virtually a member of this committee, was up before that resistance was made to that upon the Democratic side of the House, and some wonder seems to be expressed now, when this resolution is up to pay that individual out of the contingent fund of the House and Senate in accordance with that former resolution, that determined opposition is made to it here now. I wish to try to explain why it is.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], if I understood him correctly in the confusion that prevailed during the latter part of his remarks, made one statement which was inaccurate. If I understood him correctly, he said that at all times when he sought to get the original resolution up creating this committee it met with resistance upon the Democratic side.

That is an error. The resolution authorizing the creation of this joint committee was passed unanimously from the Committee on Rules; it met with no opposition on the Democratic side when it was called up for passage, but, on the contrary, it met with its unanimous support.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. When the original resolution was first brought into this House, it was brought under suspension of the rules. We failed to get two-thirds majority, because every man on that side of the House voted against it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not remember what was up on that particular day under suspension of the rules. My recollection is that there was something up ahead of it on the question of suspension, but there was never any real opposition. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] was the originator of this idea. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Virginia introduced the first resolution to create a joint committee, and subsequently the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] introduced a resolution with the same object. Democrats never opposed it. I do not know what happened on suspension day when other things were going on at that time, but Democrats supported this resolution when it finally passed, and supported it earnestly and unanimously.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman can not go further than I do in his desire to commend the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. My recollection is that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Virginia was a measure to provide for an examination of public works, and incorporated with it was his proposition for a joint committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me say a word about the reason animating gentlemen who think as I do about this matter of resistance, now and heretofore. For eight years during the Wilson administration there was a constant cry from the Republican side of the House to the effect that those upon the Democratic side were rubber stamps, that we were subject to Executive domination. Mr. Speaker, so far as my knowledge of history goes, there has never been, until this came up, a time when a President of the United States practically demanded the right to appoint a member of a legislative committee [applause on the Democratic side], and that man not a member of either legislative body. What occurred was that at the beginning of the present administration, or very shortly after it began, the President of the United States passed the word down that he wished to appoint a member of this committee created to reorganize the departments. That met with the objection of every member of the joint committee at the time, including the gentleman from Nebraska. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But the days passed by; finally the original resolution, introduced in another body, which in terms provided that that individual appointed by the President should be the chairman, was modified so that when it came before us here it did not carry the idea that he would be the chairman of the committee. And so the resolution passed over Democratic opposition, received the unanimous support of the Republican side, and a few days later the committee met and elected as the chairman of a joint legislative committee an individual appointed by the Executive.

I suppose he is a good man. I have never heard anything to his discredit. There is nothing personal toward Mr. Brown about this matter. I am willing to accept the tribute that has been paid him by the gentleman from Nebraska as being entirely true. If the committee had employed him, which it had the right to do, never would any question have been made on this side of the Chamber about paying $7,500 or $10,000 or $12,000, or whatever that committee in its judgment might have deemed proper to pay a man of his attainments and his ability. But that is not the question. The proposition is that the Executive has demanded and has officially received the authority to appoint a chairman of a legislative committee.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. I want to correct the gentleman. The President has made no demand at any time on this committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, well; he made a suggestion, which was accepted as entirely equivalent to a command, evidently, by the gentleman from Nebraska and by that side of the Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. I will agree that the President made a suggestion. I also will state that the suggestion that he be given the right to have a representative cooperating with the committee met with the approval of the Democratic members of the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; so I understood finally, although it met the disapproval of every member in the beginning, including that of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. "The gentleman from Nebraska" never disapproved of the proposition of the Executive having a representative to cooperate with the committee, but the gentleman from Nebraska never favored and did oppose any man being a member of the committee who was not a Member of Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman this question: Can the committee meet except by the call of Mr. Brown now?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; it can.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REAVIS. No; it does not; but the only reason it does not has been that Mr. Brown has been so active that he calls the committee together so often that the committee is irritated at the calls.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The fact is that that committee has never met since Mr. Brown was chairman except as Mr. Brown called them together, and it never will meet except when Mr. Brown calls them together. Infringement upon the legislative branch of the Executive! Why, Mr. Brown is the Executive.

Why could the joint committee not employ Mr. Brown as an expert without his having the sanction, the authority, and the power of a representative of the Executive?

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield me some more time?

Mr. IRELAND. I will yield to the gentleman one more minute.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. IRELAND. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] wanted to interrogate me.

Mr. REAVIS. No; I wanted to answer the question the gentleman asked. It will not take me three minutes.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me have five minutes.

Mr. IRELAND. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman permit me to answer his question as to why the committee did not employ Mr. Brown rather than accept him as the representative of the Executive?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. In the constant irritation and conflict between the departments as to whether one department shall give up this activity and it shall go to another one, or whenever there is a conflict between two departments the President must be the umpire and determine which one is to give in. In order to effect that determination, the President having such a manifold number of things to take care of, Mr. Brown speaks his voice. As an employee of the committee he could not speak it, but as the representative of the Executive he can.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, the representative of the Executive speaks the voice of the Executive to a legislative committee. [Applause and laughter.] Mr. Speaker, when before in our legislative history have the House and Senate been invited to pay out of their respective contingent funds an appointee of the Executive? There are certain funds set aside for particular purposes—a contingent fund of the House to take care of House matters, a contingent fund of the Senate to take care of Senate matters. We give to the different departments their secret and special funds. Here, now, in these days of legislative separation and sovereignty, in these days when there is no disposition upon the part of the Executive to interfere, he appoints a man who becomes a chairman of a legislative committee, and it is proposed that we shall pay his salary out of the contingent funds of the House and Senate. This man's salary can be taken care of in a deficiency bill. It ought to be taken care of in a deficiency bill. What has happened ought never to have happened. He ought never to have been appointed and given the authority given him as a representative of the Executive. [Applause.] That is not personal to Mr. Brown. That is not personal to the President. I have said nothing harsh about the President of the United States. I certainly have nothing harsh to say about him now and nothing harsh about Mr. Brown. I am pleading, if I can, to try and maintain not only the theory but the fact of the severance between the legislative and executive branches, and therein lies the fundamental reason why we upon my side of the Chamber are going to resist to the extreme the passage of this resolution and everything relating to it. [Applause.]

I yield back whatever time I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman used all his time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I should regret to feel so badly about any question under heaven as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] would seem to feel with regard to the matter now before the House. [Applause.] If he feels about it as he appears to and as he apparently would have us think he does, then he must feel that this, indeed, is the end of the Republic. What is the use of further effort? Everything is lost, including honor!

What is the situation which so disturbs the gentleman from Tennessee? The trouble with gentlemen on the minority side is that they got so accustomed to Executive dictation and coercion during the recent Democratic administration that they can not understand honest, friendly Executive cooperation with the Congress. [Applause.] I do not suppose they ever will grow accustomed to the kindly, friendly methods of cooperation with Congress which have characterized Republican Presidents in the past and that peculiarly characterizes the Republican President of to-day. They were coerced, browbeaten, given orders, told what to do, had their instructions issued to them, which they promptly, though often sullenly, obeyed, and which to a considerable extent under the stress of the days of war we also joined them in obeying. But, fortunately, the war is over. No longer would there be the war excuse, even if we had a Democratic President in the White House, for the coercion which we so often witnessed from the White House in days past. Gentlemen on the Democratic side grew so accustomed to that sort of thing under the late administration that now, when the President, in good faith and in fine spirit, cooperates with the House and the House with the President, gentlemen on the other side can not understand it or get accustomed to it. They will in the course of time, let us hope. In this case the President suggested to a committee of Congress a man of splendid capacity and attainments, devoted to the public service, whom he knew would be helpful and useful to them in their labors. That man was appointed to a position in which he could be of great assistance to the committee. It was a very proper thing that, having no vote, he should preside over the deliberations of this committee. He is doing a fine work, aiding the committee tremendously in carrying out the great undertaking they have in hand; and to-day when it is proposed that in the usual way the laborers in this important undertaking shall be paid their reasonable hire the gentlemen on the other side, still smarting and uncomfortable in the recollections of Executive coercion of the past, can not find it in their hearts to join us to-day in carrying on the good work in progress in the new area of friendly cooperation between the Congress and the Executive. [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I favored this Committee on Reorganization because we expected from it coordination of governmental functions, the stopping of waste and duplication, and one thing especially that was promised was the sending home of the surplus war emergency employees. I did not vote for this extra member of the committee who was coming from the outside, because when he was proposed certain Members stated frankly on the floor that it was merely to find a place for a political henchman in Ohio, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee then asserted that it was Mr. Brown who would get it. True he was a big political chairman, had rendered great political service, and a place had to be made for him. There was not any local State partisanship in it because he was neither a LONGWORTH man nor a FESS man. He was a Brown man and there was no local State partisanship shown in appointing him. But I did not vote for it. We expected that committee after it was organized to cut down these surplus employees.

Now, it has been stated that they have been cut down. The War Department has cut a number of employees off the pay roll. If they had been sent home it would be all right. Most of them, however, were immediately transferred to another department and still kept on the rolls. The War Risk Bureau cut off several thousand employees, and if they had been sent home it would be well and good. But most of them were immediately transferred to other departments. There is a way whereby we can tell how many have been cut off the pay roll, and that is through the Civil Service Commission. I have a statement which was furnished me by President Martin A. Morrison, of the Civil Service Commission, showing that on June 30, 1916, we had the following employees: 39,259 in the District of Columbia, and 400,539 employees elsewhere in the United States, making a total of 439,798 civil-service employees then in the United States. He also certifies that on the date of the armistice, November 11, 1918, we had the following civil-service employees: 117,760 in the District of Columbia, and 800,000 elsewhere in the United States, making a total of 917,760 civil-service employees then in the United States. He also certifies that on December 31, 1920, we had the following civil-service employees: 86,650 in the District of Columbia, and 553,525 elsewhere in the United States, making a total of 640,175 civil-service employees then in the United States.

He also certifies that on May 1, 1921, we had 84,231 civil-service employees in the District of Columbia, and that on July 1, 1921, it was contemplated that this number would be reduced about 4,500.

In other words, from December 31, 1920, when we had 86,760 civil-service employees in the District of Columbia, until May 1, 1921, when we had 84,231 civil-service employees in the District of Columbia, we succeeded in reducing the surplus employees here in Washington only 2,529 in number; and even if the further reduction contemplated by President Morrison of 4,500 by July 1, 1921, was accomplished, we have reduced the surplus employees here in Washington only 7,029 from December 31, 1920, to July 1, 1921.

Even with this contemplated reduction accomplished on July 1, 1921, we still have 40,472 more civil-service employees here in Washington than we had before the war. And for two years I have been clamoring to get these surplus employees sent home and taken from the pay roll. It is true that since the armistice to July 1, 1921, we have reduced the number of civil-service employees here in Washington from 117,760 to 79,731, yet we must remember that we had only 39,259 before the war, and the people are looking to us to get rid of this surplus.

Is this reorganization commission going to get rid of them? If not, who is going to get rid of them? The departments turn them loose, and you take them and put them into other departments. "You say, 'Here, find a place for my constituent.'" Is Mr. Brown stopping you from doing that? If he can not stop you from putting them back, there is no way to get rid of them. If the President can not stop you from putting them back, if the department can not stop you putting them back, when are we going to get rid of them? I will venture the assertion that at this time next year you will find about 75,000 of these employees still on the pay roll, because you will not let them go home, but just as fast as they are turned loose you put them into some other department. I will say that if Mr. Brown was able to do something and send these surplus employees home, I would be willing to pay him twice the salary.

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HERRICK. Is the gentleman from Texas speaking from experience?

Mr. BLANTON. I am. I always speak from experience and observation.

Mr. HERRICK. How many has the gentleman taken down there and had put back? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Not a single one. As far as I have dared to go, being a Democrat, was to request a department in selecting the ones who were to be retained to give preference to one very efficient, deserving employee.

Mr. HERRICK. I thought the gentleman said he was speaking from experience.

Mr. BLANTON. I am speaking from both experience and observation. If my friend from Oklahoma, who is always frank, will say to his employee constituents the same as I do to mine, he will not put any of them back.

Mr. HERRICK. I assure the gentleman that I have had none put back.

Mr. BLANTON. When they come to me I tell them that there are 40,000 surplus employees who must be sent home, and I am not going to try to keep them here. I will vote to send them home, and if you will help me, we will get rid of about 40,000 of them. [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, after all of our partisan amusement let us see what we have of real merit in this proposition. We organized for the specific purpose, a very desirable purpose, a joint committee of Congress consisting of three Senators and three Representatives in Congress. When it came to the consideration of the work of this joint committee it was a suggestion of the President that the administration and the executive departments could cooperate in that work if they had a place upon the committee, not upon the committee itself but with the committee, and so we took action in Congress for the appointment which resulted in the selection of Mr. Brown.

I know, as was well stated here by the chairman the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], of the House committee, that there was some apprehension felt among both the House and Senate Members with regard to this appointment. However, I believe I am justified in saying that there is not one single member of the joint committee of Congress that is not now not only satisfied but gratified by the appointment of Mr. Brown. [Applause on the Republican side.] In other words, we have had just what the gentleman from Wyoming suggests, we have had in the work of this committee not only harmony but an absolutely essential cooperation between Congress and the executive departments. They have worked together to see if they could not make effective what was desired by Congress; they have worked together for the purpose of making effective, for the purpose of really doing the thing desirable to do. In the selection of Mr. Brown a most fortunate selection was made. He is not only desirous of carrying out the will and purpose of the Executive, which is only the making effective the wish of the commission, but he has with great enthusiasm and great ability aided the commission in the performance of their duties. They not only welcome his help and the cooperation between the executive and legislative departments which has resulted, but they appreciate in the highest degree the great work he has undertaken. Whatever may be the final plan of reorganization agreed upon and reported by the committee, it can not but be better because of his work.

Now, what is the proposition before us? Gentlemen on the other side of the House say that they will fight this bill. For what purpose? For the purpose of defeating the purpose of the commission, for the purpose of defeating the cutting down of extravagance and duplication of work? Do the gentlemen on that side desire to take that position? Do they not indorse their own commission? Do not they believe that the commission has the confidence of every Member of the House on both sides? Do they think that in their opposition to this resolution they will further the work of the commission? Do they think they will assist in securing a more reasonable remedy and a more complete determination of what is desired by opposing this resolution? Certainly gentlemen can not desire to hinder or oppose the work of the commission, and it seems to me that any partisan feeling should be set aside when they come to consider the great object and purpose which is to be furthered and will be furthered by the passage of this resolution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any real misapprehension on the part of Members of the House as to the purpose of this committee or the purpose of appointing upon it to cooperate with it a personal representative of the President.

One Member a moment ago asked how many clerks and employees of the various departments this committee had discharged. Either the Member does not know or he does know that this committee was not appointed for that purpose, and has absolutely no authority to discharge anyone. If he does know, then his question was a trick; and if he does not know, I am telling him now. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Everyone with any experience in Congress knows that whenever we begin to legislate about the various departments we have a lobby in every corridor and in every office. I do not object when men who know more about the work they are doing than I know come and tell me what they know, and if we make proposals that would injure the service in which they are engaged they have a right to come and tell us. If they come with any improper lobbying methods, I shall know how to meet them; but if they come with information that I ought to have, I am glad to get it. I am not afraid of a lobbyist. But we know perfectly well that if this committee on reorganization of the administrative services were to propose something that had not the support of the executive branch of the Government we would not get very far with it. We proposed to have on the reorganization committee a personal representative of the President, who would confer with the President, and through the President with the members of the Cabinet, so that if we should suggest, for example, that Congress should take out of the Treasury Department the Public Health Service, which does not belong there, or if we should propose to take out of any department of the Government a service that is not in harmony with the general purposes of that department and put it where it belongs we should not have members of the Cabinet and heads of the various bureaus lobbying against us. We want the Executive to agree with the plan when we propose it. That means cooperation and not compulsion, of course. We want to agree. The Republican administration and the Republican Members of Congress must agree, and it is not at all surprising that the Democratic Members of Congress are trying to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery. They want to make trouble between the Republican President and the Republican Congress. Do not let them do it. We want the support of the administration for the bills that we propose; and I want to say this, that we need the knowledge which is in the possession of the executive and administrative officers of the Government concerning their organizations. We must depend upon them for it. Is there any man in Congress who knows as much about any particular service as the men who are performing that service?

Is there any Member of Congress who knows as much about the 220 bureaus and services as he can get from the 220 heads of the various services? We must get facts from the men who are familiar with them. We must have their advice as to the policies, and we may depend upon their patriotism and their desire for economy as certainly as we may depend upon our own desire for economy. We want hearty cooperation between the executive and administrative branch of the Government on the one hand and the legislative on the other, and Mr. Walter F. Brown is the link between these two branches.

As to the proposal to pay him out of the contingent fund, I call attention to the fact that that provision exists in the present law. In the resolution approved May 5, after providing for the appointment of a representative of the President, who shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable monthly, we provide that said salary be "paid in equal parts from the contingent funds of the Senate and the House, as from time to time may be duly authorized by a resolution of those bodies." We are asking now that this be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that they do not seem to be able to communicate with the Republican President except through an intermediary, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. IRELAND. Does the gentleman want some time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But I move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor for an hour.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-four Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I would have asked for any time had it not been for the statement made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] to the effect that every time this resolution had been before the House it met with opposition on this side of the Chamber. I recall that in the closing days of the session which ended in June, 1920, this resolution was brought up under suspension of the rules, and I then offered such opposition as I could to it for a number of reasons. In the first place, I may say that at that time the budget bill was actively pending and there was in the minds of some of those who favored that bill a suspicion that this proposition had been favored and promoted by some who were opposed to budget legislation of any kind and were supporting this for the purpose of defeating the budget bill. Of course, in making that statement I acquit the gentleman from Nebraska and other gentlemen upon the floor of this House who favored the resolution at that time and who have favored it since that time from any such motive, because they favored budget legislation. I opposed it then for that reason and also from the fact that we had just had a report from the Reclassification Commission, a commission composed of Senators and Representatives, who had spent something over $100,000 in investigating the departments for the purpose of making a report and recommendations in the interest of economy and efficiency; and also because there was a Bureau of Efficiency, for which Congress is appropriating more than $100,000 a year, and the further fact that it was understood that budget legislation would be adopted and this would be a clear duplication of the work of those three agencies. It was defeated at that time by nearly a majority vote under a suspension of the rules vote, which required two-thirds. As my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] stated, it came up in December from the Committee on Rules with the unanimous report from that committee from both the Republicans and Democrats, and there was no opposition upon the floor of this House to its passage at that time. I am opposed to this resolution because I am opposed to this method of making appropriations. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe that what Congress should do when it makes an appropriation is to make a direct appropriation, rather than an indefinite appropriation, because I dare say there will not be 25 Members of this House, unless they go to the trouble of looking up the record and making an investigation, who will ever know just how much this reorganization committee will spend on this work if this resolution is adopted, as it will be. There is going to be a deficiency bill reported to this House in 10 days, or possibly two weeks. Why is it not possible to make provision in that deficiency bill to pay the salary of Mr. Brown or the salary of the other employees of this reorganization committee? That is what ought to be done. That is the businesslike method to pursue. That is the only method by which you can proceed in order and let the country know just what Congress is appropriating for this and for other purposes. Something has been said here about Executive interference. My colleague from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has stated that in the past eight years the country has been entertained by gentlemen on the other side who have insisted that President Wilson was almost daily and constantly interfering with the legislative branch of our Government.

Gentlemen, in my judgment the passage of the resolution creating this position, an officer appointed by the President, and who is a Member of neither the House nor Senate, but who was made a member and chairman of a legislative committee, surpasses any Executive interference in the whole history of this Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can search the legislative history of this country from beginning to end and you will find no case, in my opinion, where any such thing as this has been done. Why, my good friend, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], says that this is only "friendly" cooperation between the Executive and the legislative. Friendly cooperation when, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] says, it was essential and important to have a man as member of the committee who was in touch with the Executive and could make known to the Executive what the legislative branch of the Government desired.

Mr. TEMPLE. No; the gentleman does not wish to misquote me; I did not say that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the effect of what the gentleman stated.

Mr. TEMPLE. Not in my judgment at all.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit to the gentleman that he said that it was important to have some one who could reach the Executive and the departments—

Mr. TEMPLE. Not at all.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not intend to do my friend an injustice, but I think if the gentleman will read his remarks he will find he said something like that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I think that I am not overstating when I say that it was universally conceded that one of the great reforms to be worked in the Government was a reorganization of the departments. While I do not know that the Democratic national platform so asserted, I do know that the Republican platform did, and the statement has been repeated often from our side of the House, and I think it has been from the Democratic side of the House. The need of reorganization is because we have grown-up for years until through accretion there is no coordination. I know of no movement that has a greater response than the demand for a reorganization to reduce the duplication of work. The present President took a decided view upon that in the campaign, speaking to this feature at times and specifying that as one of the things to be done. One of the men speaking through the country on the same subject with great effect because of his talent for organization and dealing in detail was the man who afterwards was brought here to represent the President. He was chosen, as the gentleman from Nebraska stated, not because of what has been suggested by some of our good friends on the Democratic side. Mr. Brown was not a candidate for any position, but, as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] has said, he declined, I know, the offer of an ambassadorship, for I talked with him and expressed my surprise that he did not accept the honor.

His statement to me was that he was not seeking position, but if there was anything that he could do for the benefit of the Nation and the administration he might be willing to be drafted into the service. I regret more than I can tell that a gentleman of this type of service to the Nation should have his motives impugned as they have been by some of our thoughtless friends. It does not reflect great promise on securing talent of high grade for such service.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Not by my friend from Tennessee, because he did not impugn the motives of Mr. Brown.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I never intended to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. I said he was neither a FESS nor a LONGWORTH man, but a Brown man.

Mr. FESS. I am rather inclined to think the gentleman ought not to bring an argument of that sort, an argument of such a puerile basis as that. If the gentleman does not know that he is disrespecting his own position in the House the membership of the House does know it.

Here is a reorganization of what? Of the executive departments. And why is it that the Executive, who must know the needs of the organization, who is committed to the need of reorganization, is refused to have a spokesman committed with him to the reorganization? That is why the President has suggested there be a representation on this committee. And, secondly, it is wrong to assume that the President asks that he be made the chairman of the committee. If the selection of Mr. Brown for chairman of the committee is a crime or a fault, then it is congressional—a fault of the Congress, not of the Executive—because the committee elected him as the chairman and did it in accordance with their own view. And I think it was a wise thing to do. The point with me is, whether you vote this up or down, this reorganization must be accomplished. The President ought to have a liaison officer between the appropriating body and the executive body. That person is now the chairman by the choice of the committee itself, the joint committee. That we would inject here such suggestions that the position is created for the purpose of making a place for a politician is pitiable, gentlemen. I think we ought to stop this sort of business and do what we have obligated ourselves to do and not further play politics on a question like this.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 45, noes 93.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present, and I challenge the vote for that reason.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary that there should be a quorum on a vote for adjournment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not require a quorum to adjourn, but it requires a quorum not to adjourn. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, however, I am right about that. Of course, it does not require a quorum to adjourn if a majority should vote in favor of adjournment, but they could not adjourn if a majority voted against adjournment, and I think I was entitled to make the point of no quorum on that basis. But I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 125, answered "present" 9, not voting 229, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. MARTIN (for) with Mr. RODENBERG (against).

Mr. POE (for) with Mr. WOODYARD (against).

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri (for) with Mr. BELL (against).

General pairs:

Mr. ANDERSON with Mr. OLDFIELD.

Mr. WALSH with Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina.

Mr. MUDD with Mr. GARNER.

Mr. WILLIAMS with Mr. CRISP.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma with Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. KENDALL with Mr. BRINSON.

Mr. GORMAN with Mr. CANTRELL.

Mr. HAYES with Mr. LEE of Georgia.

Mr. KNUTSON with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. DYER with Mr. LAZARO.

Mr. VARE with Mr. HAWES.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania with Mr. CARTER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening?

Mr. SISSON. I was present. I do not know whether I was listening at the time or not, but I did my best to listen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must decide that question for himself.

Mr. SISSON. I can not positively state whether or not I was listening at the time my name was called, but I did my best.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must decide.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know. If I had been listening at the time, I think I would have heard my name called.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman state that he was listening when his name was called?

Mr. SISSON. I can not.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I was outside the Chamber telegraphing when my name was called, and I just came in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the bells.

Mr. BRAND. I heard only one set of bells.

The SPEAKER. That does not qualify the gentleman.

Mr. BRAND. I suppose so, but the bells ought to be corrected.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I came over on the first bell.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can qualify for a quorum. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS] can also be counted as present.

Mr. SISSON. That is what I understand. Must I be counted as present?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can be counted as present. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND] is in the same position.

Mr. BURTON. Can I be counted as present?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BURTON, and he answered "present."

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I started when the first bell rang, and I came over as rapidly as I could.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can be recorded as present.

Mr. BRIGGS. Can I be recorded as present?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BRAND. And I?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is rejected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, does that represent a quorum as present?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.
The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] is recorded as being present?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded as present.

Mr. BLANTON. I heard some one answer, who I thought perhaps was answering when his name was called.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 225 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee), there were—ayes 123, noes 53.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, that vote was pretty close. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 73, answered "present" 3, not voting 208, as follows:

So the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. RODENBERG (for) with Mr. MARTIN (against).
Mr. BUTLER (for) with Mr. HUMPHREYS (against).
Mr. WOODYARD (for) with Mr. POU (against).
Mr. TREADWAY (for) with Mr. COLLIER (against).
Mr. REBER (for) with Mr. WISE (against).

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri (for) with Mr. BUCHANAN (against).
Mr. DENISON (for) with Mr. Woods of Virginia (against).
Mr. HICKS (for) with Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania (against).

Mr. KAHN (for) with Mr. HAYDEN (against).
Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker I desire to vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not sure about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can vote "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. VOLSTEAD and he answered "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. GILLET, and he voted in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, does the vote develop a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It does. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] for the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending that, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In view of the closeness of the vote to a quorum, would it be in order for the gentleman from Wyoming, for instance, to offer a resolution to permit the President to appoint a few Members here to vote on this question?

Mr. MONDELL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] for the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 149, nays 56, answering "present" 5, not voting 221, as follows:

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," but I have a pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY. I therefore wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire if the roll call has been concluded?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is waiting for the figures from the Clerk.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman voted "aye."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I regret to see the majority leader conduct a filibuster here. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The yeas are 150 and the nays 55, "present" 5. A quorum is not present, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit that that motion is not in order after a call of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There are two things in order, one to adjourn and the other for somebody with responsibility to make a motion that the Speaker issue his warrant and get the Republicans in.

Mr. IRELAND. By what right does the gentleman exclude the Democrats?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We are here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is too late to make the motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is only hesitating as to whether or not the motion is dilatory.

Mr. MONDELL. It is an automatic call.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is no one on the floor who has even suggested that the motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary that it be suggested. It is the duty of the Speaker not to admit a dilatory motion. The Chair is always slow to hold a motion dilatory. The Chair thinks the only time he should hold a motion dilatory is when he not only thinks it dilatory himself but when he thinks the whole membership would agree that it is dilatory. Early in the afternoon the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] announced his implacable hostility to this resolution. He has moved to adjourn several times, and all these motions have been defeated by a party vote. If the gentleman from Tennessee will say that the motion is not dilatory, then the Chair will recognize it; but, of course, the Chair has no right to ask the gentleman to say that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, would it be dilatory if the gentleman from Wyoming were to make the motion?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that would be quite different.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming has made no such motion.

The SPEAKER. Being made as it is, the Chair thinks the motion is dilatory and that the gentleman has no right to make it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It has been a partisan vote right through during the afternoon, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] having voted, the Chair presumes, in the same way—

Mr. BARKLEY. But the Chair has no right to presume how I voted on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. All of the Democratic side have voted to adjourn. The Chair holds the motion to be dilatory. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the Clerk to call the names simply of those who did not answer on the last call?

The SPEAKER. No. He is to call the whole roll again. It is just the same as a division. When a quorum fails to appear on a division an automatic roll call follows. Speaker Clark made this same ruling.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and there were—yeas 152, nays 61, answered "present" 3, not voting 215, as follows:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERRICK. Does that include the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IRELAND. I would like to inquire if the calling for order by the gentleman who has been the chief disturbing element of the day—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is out of order.

Mr. IRELAND. Is a matter of self-discipline?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to wait until we get a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. I am sure the Speaker will not hold that out of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, that is dilatory.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Has the vote of the recent roll call been announced?

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was wondering how that could be determined without the tally clerk striking a total.

The SPEAKER. The tally clerk notified the Speaker.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I did not know.

The SPEAKER. The roll call discloses eight short of a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the Speaker has issued his warrant—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. By what authority?

Mr. MONDELL. For absent Members, who will soon be here, sufficiently to make up a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Send the Sergeant at Arms to the Post Office Department and he will get a batch.

Mr. BLANTON. Or the baseball game.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would be true perhaps at 4.30, but not this late.

Mr. BLANTON. It is now five minutes to 6 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire if the statement just made by the gentleman from Wyoming is correct, that the Speaker has issued his warrant for Members?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I inquire by what authority?

The SPEAKER. Clause 4 of Rule XV.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as I remember clause 4 of Rule XV, it requires that there should be passed a resolution by the House. Less than a quorum could pass such a resolution; but the Speaker, on his own initiative, as I remember it, can not issue a warrant.

The SPEAKER. The rule says that the Sergeant at Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent Members.

Mr. GARNER. And he has to get authority by resolution, at least since I have been here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the rule:

Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and a quorum is not present and objection is made for that cause, unless the House shall adjourn, there shall be a call of the House, and the Sergeant at Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent Members, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be considered as ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each Member as he answers to his name may vote on the pending question, and then, after the roll call is completed, each Member arrested shall be brought by the Sergeant at Arms before the House, whereupon he shall be noted as present, discharged from arrest, and given an opportunity to vote, and his vote shall be recorded.

If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted, and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear. And thereupon further proceedings under the call shall be dispensed with. At any time after the roll has been completed, the Speaker may entertain a motion to adjourn, if seconded by a majority of those present, to be ascertained by actual count by the Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is true, of course, that it is the duty of the Sergeant at Arms to notify absentees when a quorum fails to appear, but I do not believe that the Speaker at any time has ever issued his warrant except by a resolution of the House passed authorizing the same to be done.

The SPEAKER. The rule says:

After the roll call is completed each Member arrested shall be brought by the Sergeant at Arms before the House.

Now, the Sergeant at Arms would not have authority to arrest without the warrant of the Speaker, therefore it must contemplate the warrant.

The Chair finds a decision by Speaker CANNON as follows, in Hinds', section 3043:

The Chair is still of opinion that under the practice in the House he is authorized to issue the warrant, although, as stated before, the Chair is inclined to be of the opinion that when the fact arises under clause 4 of Rule XV the Sergeant at Arms, on verbal direction of the Speaker, as that rule provides, can bring in absent Members.

The Chair thinks it was exactly on all fours with the present case.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, as I understand, Mr. Speaker, the Speaker holds that without previous authority, by resolution or otherwise, from the House, he may issue his warrant directing the Sergeant at Arms to take in custody absent Members and bring them to the bar of the House?

The SPEAKER. In the absence of a quorum on an automatic call.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it not obvious that the gentleman from Tennessee is confusing section 4 of the rule with section 2?

Section 2 provides:

In the absence of a quorum, 15 Members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members.

But section 4 provides for an automatic call of the House:

Whenever a quorum is not present and objection is made for that cause, unless the House shall adjourn there shall be a call of the House, and the Sergeant at Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent Members.

That is precisely the situation that arose. There was an automatic call of the House and the House did not adjourn, and it became the duty of the Speaker to instruct the Sergeant at Arms to perform his duty.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not a question of instructing the Sergeant at Arms. It is a question of the right of a Speaker to issue a warrant for the arrest of Members. Perhaps what I had in thought was a provision of the Constitution, section 5, Article I, to the effect that:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such manner, and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes, Mr. Speaker, and the House has provided that rule to carry out that provision of the Constitution, and the rule which requires the procedure of which the gentleman from Tennessee is speaking is in section 2 of Rule XV, and the automatic call under which we are proceeding now is in section 4, which provides precisely for the procedure that has been carried on at the present time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not complaining about the automatic calls at all. The Speaker has been entirely correct in his rulings about that. I have some question about the wisdom of the ruling which was made a little bit ago, that caused a complete call when the absence of a quorum had been developed; that is, a complete call the second time. I understood the Chair followed a precedent as to that. I am not complaining of the rulings of the Speaker. But I doubt very much—and I think we can be serious for a moment—I doubt very much the right of the Speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of Members except by authority expressly given by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire if Members are brought in under arrest it will be laid before the House that they are brought in under arrest?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, of course, Mr. Speaker, we should have to inquire a good many times as to where they had been and why they were absent from their duties.

Mr. IRELAND. Does the gentleman think it entirely wise to insist on that procedure?

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the fact that most of the absentees are Republicans, I do not think it would be.

Mr. IRELAND. That has not developed as yet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the truth of it is, there is no good reason on earth why this House should not now adjourn.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is a motion to adjourn in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cross that bridge when the time comes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I make a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hold that that is dilatory.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If it is dilatory under the rules of the House, you can only get a quorum or adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will quote the rule to the gentleman:

At any time after the roll call has been completed the Speaker may entertain a motion to adjourn, if seconded by a majority of those present, to be ascertained by actual count by the Speaker.

The Chair thinks the gentleman has a right to make the motion.

Mr. MONDELL. I hold that that is manifestly dilatory, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. But the question is, Does a majority of those present second him? As many as desire to second the motion to adjourn will rise and be counted. [After counting.] Fifty-three gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and be counted. [After counting.] One hundred and fourteen gentlemen have risen in the negative.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The rule says the second is to be ascertained by actual count by the Speaker; therefore tellers can not be demanded.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that nothing is in order in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is not a parliamentary inquiry in order?

Mr. TEMPLE. If that is the case, is it in order for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to reply to a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it in order to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Would it be in order to ask permission to correct the Record on a vote?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thinks not.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi changes his vote from "present" to "no." On this vote the yeas are 152, the nays 61, present 3. A quorum is present. The yeas have it, and the previous question is ordered. [Applause.]

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. ROGERS (for) with Mr. DUPRE (against).

Mr. BUTLER (for) with Mr. RIORDAN (against).

Mr. RODENBERG (for) with Mr. MARTIN (against).

Mr. WOODYARD (for) with Mr. POV (against).

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment, while the Chair submits some personal requests?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JAMES, indefinitely, on account of the illness of his father.

To Mr. REED of West Virginia, for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. DRANE, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORGAN, for five days, on account of important business.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wyoming withhold his motion to adjourn for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. IRELAND. I ask leave of absence for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT], on account of illness—an indefinite leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 27, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. KRAUS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7870) for the relief of L. C. Johnson, jr., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 292); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2558) for the relief of Richard P. McCullough, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 293); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 27, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we approach Thee this morning with gladsome hearts, recognizing the goodness that is continued unto us day by day. We want so to appreciate Thy continued favor that our lives shall bear testimony of our gratitude, that we may live before Thee according to Thine own good pleasure. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, July 22, 1921, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 25) providing for the employment of telephone operators in the Capitol telephone exchange, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an error in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings. The RECORD does not state just what happened, and because I expect later on in the debate on the unfinished business to discuss just what did happen I wish to call attention this morning to the error in the RECORD. I am not caring whether the Senate desires to change it or not, but I think, technically, I would be entitled to have it changed.

The RECORD starts out in this way:

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Next is a message from the House of Representatives.

The RECORD is wrong in this respect. It ought to state that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] was in the chair. It does not state that. It ought to state next after that the recognition of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] by the Presiding Officer. As a matter of fact, the Senator from Minnesota was recognized by the Senator from Kansas, the Presiding Officer, who called the Senate to order, before anything else was done and before the Senator from Minnesota addressed the Chair.

As I said, I am not particular about having the RECORD show it, but that is what happened, and because I expect to discuss it later on when I get the floor and the unfinished business is before the Senate I desired to call attention to just what occurred.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of sundry veterans of the Spanish-American War and the Mexican border campaign, now at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation granting them the same hospital privileges as are extended ex-service men of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of sundry citizens of Tampa, Lost Springs, Marion, Hillsboro, Hope, Ramona, Herington, Woodbine, and Chapman, all in the State of Kansas, protesting against the enactment of the so-called Ralston-Nolan bill, or any sales or single tax bill, favoring the enactment of legislation placing the tax burden upon big business and large incomes and compelling it to pay back taxes which may have been evaded by stock issues, etc., and also favoring the enactment of legislation defining profiteering and providing penalties therefor, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Women's Auxiliary, James R. Cutler Post, the American Legion, of Abilene, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation providing adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Ladies' Presbyterian Missionary Society, of Bucklin, Kans., praying that permanent relief and protection be afforded the imperiled peoples of the Near East, particularly of Armenia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of the municipality of the city of Pittsburg, Kans., favoring the recognition of the republic of Ireland by the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented two petitions of sundry citizens of Garnett and Richmond, both in the State of Kansas, praying for the recognition of the republic of Ireland by the Government of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Climax, Mich., praying for the calling of an international disarmament conference by the Government of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of East Jordan, Mich., praying that permanent relief and protection be afforded the imperiled peoples of the Near East, particularly of Armenia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented four memorials of sundry citizens of Dublin, Reed City, Kingley, Fife Lake, and Traverse City, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation making stringent regulations for the observance of Sunday in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted at a meeting of the agricultural committee of the Louisiana Bankers' Association, urging Congress to use efforts toward bringing about a readjustment and substantial lowering of freight rates; also indorsing the attitude of the Government in fostering and encouraging water transportation. It is very brief, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISIANA BANKERS' ASSOCIATION, AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE,
June 9, 1921.

At a meeting of the agricultural committee of the Louisiana Bankers' Association, composed of the following members: Dr. R. O. Young, Youngsville, chairman; T. F. Flournoy, Monroe; R. A. Kent, Kentwood; W. E. Lawson, Crowley; and C. C. Gaspard, New Orleans, secretary, held in the city of Baton Rouge, La., on this day, the following resolutions were offered and unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the foundation of our national prosperity is based upon agriculture; and

"Whereas the present unsettled conditions are due, in a great measure, to the losses sustained by the farmers of this country as a result of the large decline in the prices of farm products; and

"Whereas the farmers of this country are directly affected by the increased freight rates, for the reason that what they have to sell is taxed and what they purchase also bears the burden of high freight rates; and

"Whereas we believe it is the policy of the present administration to relieve as far as possible the present unfortunate conditions existing in the farming districts of our country: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we respectfully urge upon our Senators and Members of Congress the using of their influence and efforts toward bringing about a readjustment and substantial lowering of freight rates as they now exist.

"We also desire to commend and approve the attitude of the Government in fostering and encouraging water transportation which will have the effect of bringing relief by the readjusting of freight rates. We trust that it will continue its efforts along this line as far as is consistent."

The foregoing is a true copy of resolutions passed by the agricultural committee of the Louisiana Bankers' Association, June 9, 1921, at Baton Rouge, La.

C. C. GASPARD,
Secretary Agricultural Committee.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I present a resolution of the Commercial Club, of Lovell, Wyo., protesting against the provisions of Senate bill 1355, to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a post-roads and interstate-highway system, and so forth, which it is maintained would have the effect of destroying the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture over road and trail construction within the national forests. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. KENDRICK. I also present a resolution adopted by the Wyoming State Board of School Land Commissioners, indorsing Senate bill 1721, to vest titles to school lands in the State in which the lands are situated if a proceeding is not instituted before the Department of the Interior within 12 years after the State is admitted to the Union, or within 12 years after the survey of the school-land sections was approved, to determine whether such lands were of known mineral character. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

FREIGHT RATES AND THE TRUCKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by produce growers of Williston, S. C., and near-by territory relative to the prohibitive freight rates on fruits and vegetables.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the growers at Williston, S. C., July 13, 1921.

The production of cotton having proven disastrous to the farmers of this section, and realizing that the future held no relief in store, owing to the advent of the boll weevil and the decline in price of cotton— which price is now below cost of production—our farmers turned their attention to food crops, with the result that a large acreage was planted in truck in the spring of the current year. The yield from these crops has been excellent and the prices obtained in the northern markets highly satisfactory, but the returns from the sales have revealed the fact that the transportation charges have absorbed practically the entire gross proceeds, as evidenced by many returns received by our growers, a copy of one of which returns being appended hereto: Therefore be it

Resolved by the produce growers of Williston and territory contiguous thereto, That we vigorously protest against the exorbitant and prohibitive freight rates on fruits and vegetables in force from this section, rates which if maintained will kill the trucking industry in this section, bring about the reduction of our progressive citizenship to abject poverty, and render our material resources valueless; and we feel that we are justified in demanding relief from such outrageous discrimination in order that an equitable distribution of the proceeds of our produce may be made between the grower and the railroads.

Resolved further, That copies of these resolutions be sent to our Representatives in Congress, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to the President of the United States.

AMBASSADOR GEORGE HARVEY.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to present and ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from a group of ladies composing the Mount Holly Branch of the Charlotte (N. C.) War Camp Community Service, protesting against certain utterances of Mr. Harvey, ambassador of this country to Great Britain.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOUNT HOLLY, N. C., July 19, 1921.

HON. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We, a band of patriotic women, composing the Mount Holly Branch of the Charlotte War Camp Community Service, feel that we would be untrue to the loyal traditions to which we cling and disloyal to the Stars and Stripes, to which we proudly owe allegiance, if we failed to denounce the recent utterances of Ambassador Harvey at the Court of St. James. His sentiments, as expressed, may be typical of the paltry politicians who would prostitute their high positions to avenge personal grievances, as he has done; but they are not representative of the mass of American citizenship, as is evidenced by the storm of disapproval that has arisen from every part of this great country. To this disapproval we wish to give our hearty and vigorous indorsement.

In the days of preparation for the conflict we cooperated with our Government in every particular. Aside from "Hooverizing" in our homes, doing our part as Red Cross workers in the preparation of surgical dressings and supplies, purchasing Liberty bonds and war savings stamps, we helped to sustain the morale of the boys in the training camps. In our homes they were not only welcome but honored guests. While they were wading through the mud and blood and the stench of the battle fields, we upheld them by our messages of cheer, our gifts, and our prayers. Now that they have come home battle scarred and maimed, marked by disease and death as their lawful prey, we are still proving our loyalty, as the records of Oteen, Kenilworth, and Sevier will show.

Having thus demonstrated our faith by our works, we feel that we have the right to condemn the remarks of Ambassador Harvey as un-American, misleading, and unworthy of the brave boys who fell in Flanders fields, and unbecoming the representative of this great country of ours.

Mrs. T. M. McCoy,
President.
Mrs. W. T. JOHNSON,
Vice President.
Miss ADA DUNN,
Recording Secretary.
Mrs. LOUISE D. HENDERSON,
Corresponding Secretary.

These resolutions were adopted several weeks ago, but owing to peculiar circumstances have been delayed in forwarding.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION (S. DOC. NO. 55).

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the other day, on behalf of the Japanese Exclusion League of California, with the approval of the entire California delegation, a brief was presented to the Secretary of State upon the question of Japanese exclusion and Japanese colonization. The brief is pertinent to a pending matter of very great consequence to the West and to the Nation, too. I desire to have that brief printed as a public document. I have submitted the matter to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], neither of whom objects. I therefore ask leave to have it printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ASSOCIATION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and submitted a report (No. 236) thereon.

INVESTIGATION OF LOBBYING ACTIVITIES.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, on the 1st of July the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] reported from the Committee on the Judiciary Senate resolution 77, creating a special committee to investigate the expenditures made in behalf of various propaganda and in the maintenance of lobbies in Washington. By mistake the resolution was not referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but was placed on the calendar. I ask that the resolution be referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be taken from the calendar and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. EDGE (for Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN):

A bill (S. 2309) to incorporate the Hudson River Pontoon Bridge Co., and to authorize the construction of a pontoon bridge and approaches at or near the city of Yonkers, Westchester County, N. Y., across the Hudson River to the State of New Jersey, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2310) for the relief of James Rundle; and

A bill (S. 2311) for the relief of Erick Iverson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 2312) to authorize the leasing for mining purposes of unallotted lands on the Fort Peck and Blackfeet Indian Reservations in the State of Montana; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2313) granting an increase of pension to Clement F. S. Aimes (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2314) granting a pension to Mary Trott (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2315) granting a pension to Sarah A. Dickinson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 2316) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations"; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 2317) providing for a limitation of the time within which actions may be commenced questioning the title to lands granted States or Territories; and

A bill (S. 2318) providing for a limitation of the time within which actions may be commenced questioning the title to lands granted States or Territories (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

A bill (S. 2319) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States"; and

A bill (S. 2320) to amend the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary" approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2321) for the relief of W. M. G. Mackechney;

A bill (S. 2322) for the relief of T. T. Murphy; and

A bill (S. 2323) for the relief of Anna M. Tobin, independent executrix of the estate of Frank R. Tobin, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO TARIFF BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to present two amendments intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, which I ask may be printed and referred to the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have also a resolution passed by the Shipping Board, touching the subject of one of the proposed amendments, which I ask may be printed in the Record and referred also to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, July 26, 1921.

HON. WESLEY L. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: By direction of the board, I beg to advise you that the following resolution was adopted by the Shipping Board at a meeting to-day:

Whereas the United States tariff law now provides that—

"A discriminating duty of 10 per cent ad valorem in addition to the duties imposed by law shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States," etc.; and

Whereas the above statute was but the transforming into law of emphatic declarations which had been made by both great political parties; and

Whereas the retention of this law was clearly contemplated when the provision in section 34 of the Jones bill, so called, was enacted; and

Whereas such legislation is necessary to enable American vessels to meet the higher operating expenses and maintain the higher standard of wages paid on American vessels and thus enable such vessels successfully to engage in the foreign carrying trade of this country; and Whereas the making effective of such provision should tend to raise the market value of American ships to replacement figures and should cause shipping men to invest in the ships now owned by the United States, and thus put the Shipping Board fleet into private hands as Congress and the public desire—

Resolved, That the Shipping Board recommends that the above quoted statute of the United States be made a part of the tariff bill now before Congress.

For the information of the Senate a copy of the foregoing resolution has also been transmitted to the President of the Senate.

Sincerely, yours,

CLIFFORD W. SMITH, Secretary.

Mr. CURTIS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7456, the tariff bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. BURSUM submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by him to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. KELLOGG to the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. EDGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. KELLOGG to the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MARTHA E. HART.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 1846, 66th Cong., 3d sess.) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Hart be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CAPITOL TELEPHONE OPERATORS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 25) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, until otherwise provided by law compensation at the rate of $100 per month each for the services of telephone operators in the Capitol telephone exchange—seven in the employ of the Senate and nine annual and three session in the employ of the House—and for the services of a chief operator at compensation at the rate of $150 per month: Provided, That such employments shall be in lieu of a like number of telephone operators now authorized and provided in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 3, 1921.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the status of the concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives which has just been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and will be so referred.

REPUBLIC OF HAITI AND THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I desire to call up Senate resolution 112, to which objection was made yesterday afternoon by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], providing for the appointment of a select committee of five Senators to inquire into the occupation and administration of the territories of the Dominican Republic and the Republic of Haiti. I do not know whether Senators wish to ask any further questions about the resolution as amended by the committee. I desire to offer as an amendment to the resolution a proviso, omitted by inadvertence, to cover the expenses of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I just came into the Chamber. May I inquire what is the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Senate resolution 112, reading as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators—

Amended to read "five," and also amended by adding "two of whom shall be members of the minority," so that as proposed to be amended by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the resolution will read:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, two of whom shall be members of the minority, appointed by the President of the Senate, is hereby authorized and instructed to inquire into the occupation and administration of the territories of the Republic of Haiti and of the Dominican Republic by the forces of the United States. For this purpose such committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and such places as by it may be deemed advisable, to require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether he deems it necessary to add the second amendment, requiring that two shall be of the minority party? I think we have such confidence in the Vice President that there is no necessity for it.

Mr. McCORMICK. That amendment seemed to me to be entirely unnecessary. I had assumed, when I introduced the resolution, that of course the Chair would guard the rights of the minority, but the minority member of the committee to which the resolution was referred sought to protect the minority interests by the amendment, and therefore I make no objection to it.

Mr. KING. It seems to me to be a rather bad precedent to insert in every resolution which calls for appointment by the presiding officer the proportion of the minority and the proportion of the majority. Speaking for myself as a member of the minority, I would not ask it. I am willing to trust the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I did not object to the consideration of the resolution, which has been favorably reported by the committee, but I am opposed to it. I do not think any good will come from its passage or that there is any necessity for it. I think it will simply mean that much additional expense without any good result.

It seems to me that the State Department and the Navy Department, having charge of the occupation of Haiti and the Dominican Republic, and therefore being in possession of the facts, could present them to one of the regular standing committees of Congress. Then, if that committee, after having obtained the facts which the administration sent to it, should deem it necessary that further examination should be made, it might be well so to recommend to Congress. The passage of this resolution will furnish a very nice trip, probably, to a committee of the Senate to go down there and look into what appears to have been the situation in a past administration. If there is any criticism it is likely the committee will divide on party lines; the majority will condemn and the minority will uphold, and the only result will be the expenditure probably of several thousand dollars. For these reasons I am going to vote against the passage of the resolution, though I did not feel that I ought to object to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendments reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate were in line 1, before the word "Senators," to strike out "three" and insert "five"; and in the same line, after the word "Senators," to insert "two of whom shall be members of the minority"; so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, two of whom shall be members of the minority, appointed by the President of the Senate, is hereby authorized and instructed to inquire into the occupation and administration of the territories of the Republic of Haiti and of the Dominican Republic by the forces of the United States, etc.

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from Illinois to add the following at the end of the resolution:

All expenses of the committee or any subcommittee thereof incurred under this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers authorized by the committee, signed by the chairman thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MALT LIQUORS AND WINES FOR MEDICINAL PURPOSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 117) submitted by Mr. MOSES on the 25th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the regulations which are reported to have been drawn by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, pursuant to an opinion rendered by Attorney General Palmer, to provide for the use of malt liquors and wines for medicinal purposes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the author of the resolution, does not appear to be on the floor. I therefore ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice until to-morrow, retaining its present position.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF DISTRICT RENT ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill No. 2131.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. Let the title of the bill be reported, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2131) to extend for the period of seven months the provision of Title II of the food control and the District of Columbia rent act, approved October 22, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware if he thinks the consideration of the bill will lead to any discussion?

Mr. BALL. It is impossible for me to state, but I hope not.

Mr. STERLING. In view of the fact that the Senator from Delaware is unable to state—

Mr. BALL. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to state that the bill for which I ask consideration ought to be acted on now, because the rent law expires on the 22d of October next. The bill will have to pass the Senate and go to the other House, and if any action is to be taken on it, it ought to be taken promptly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to appeal to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to allow the meas-are suggested by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to come before the Senate for consideration. It has heretofore had rather extensive consideration. I believe it is of such an urgent nature that action ought to be had upon it.

Mr. STERLING. I quite agree with the Senator from Montana in that respect, but the bill of which I have charge has been pending now for a long time before the Senate; it has been discussed on three several days in the Senate; and it is very important that it should be speedily passed. The demand which is being made upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for regulations relative to the manufacture of beer makes it, I think, more important than anything that could come before the Senate at this time. I hope the Senator from Delaware will not be disposed to insist on the consideration of his bill now.

Mr. BALL. If the Senator from South Dakota objects, of course, I can not have the bill taken up, but unless there is objection I will press its consideration.

Mr. STERLING. I shall feel it my duty, under the circumstances, to object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. STERLING. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

Mr. STERLING. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7294.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill H. R. 7294, supplemental to the national prohibition act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 2, line 4.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Moses	Smoot
Ball	Heflin	Nelson	Spencer
Brandeggee	Hitchcock	Newberry	Stanfield
Broussard	Johnson	Nicholson	Sterling
Bursum	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Sutherland
Capper	Kendrick	Norris	Townsend
Culberson	Kenyon	Oddie	Trammell
Curtis	Keyes	Overman	Underwood
Dial	King	Phipps	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Ladd	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	La Follette	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Lenroot	Reed	Warren
Fletcher	McCormick	Robinson	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	McKellar	Sheppard	Watson, Ind.
Hale	McKinley	Shortridge	Weller
Harrell	McLean	Simmons	Williams
Harris	McNary	Smith	Willis

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. He is in attendance on the Finance Committee.

I also desire to announce the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 2, line 4.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, considerable criticism has been made of the Senators who have opposed the passage of this measure without full discussion. The Judiciary Committee, in reporting this bill, has claimed for it that it is an emergency measure. While there was unfinished business of great importance to this Nation, and while the maternity bill was under consideration under a unanimous-consent agreement, an effort was made to agree on a date for voting on this bill. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who I think favors the passage of this bill, urged certain objections which might complicate matters; and for that reason, and at the instance of a great many Members who questioned the constitutionality of this bill, I objected to unanimous consent. For that the lobby of the Anti-Saloon League have criticized those of us who, in justice to our oaths and to the people we represent, have merely asked that the Senate hear the discussion of this matter.

It is claimed for this bill that it is an emergency measure; and what is the emergency that we find here? We find that the conditions which present themselves in the consideration of this bill are such that those who are criticized really are the law-abiding element in the Senate. We find that on March 3, 1921, the Attorney General rendered an opinion to the effect that the Volstead Act or the national prohibition act never prevented the prescription of beer and wine. That opinion has been concurred in by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and no one on this floor has claimed that that opinion was not in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the national prohibition act. So that the emergency here, Mr. President, is that those who are charged with the execution of this law do not find that the laws suit them, and for that reason ask the Congress to enact a law that is according to their liking; and those who merely want to request permission to discuss not only the merits, but the constitutionality of the bill have been criticized throughout this country.

I want to show this morning that not only since March 3, 1921, have the agents of this Government, in defiance of the law, refused to carry out the mandates of Congress, but that within 11 days after the national prohibition act went into effect it was the opinion of the commissioner and of the enforcement officer of the Federal Government that there never was any inhibition against the prescription of beer, and that they have had under consideration since the month of February, 1921, the formulating of the regulations which were to govern the prescription of beer and wine.

I have here, Mr. President, a letter written by a Member of Congress, who is on the Ways and Means Committee, on January 21, 1920. You will recall that the prohibition law went into effect on January 16, 1920, so that within five days after that a Member of Congress addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue asking for a ruling on the question now being discussed in this body. The letter reads as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, January 21, 1920.

Hon. DANIEL C. ROPER,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROPER: A constituent of mine has asked for a ruling on the following matter, which does not seem to be covered clearly by the Volstead Act:

Is it possible to manufacture an ale containing perhaps 4 or 5 per cent of alcohol, this ale to be manufactured and placed on sale as a medicinal product? If so, what regulations would govern the manufacture and sale of this product?

Your attention is called to the Volstead Act, section 7, in which it is stated that only a physician holding a permit to prescribe liquor shall issue any prescription for liquor. The word "liquor" used here, I suppose, also means malt liquors. However, a little further down in the same section it is stated:

"Not more than a pint of spirituous liquors to be taken internally shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of 10 days, and no prescription shall be filled more than once."

Malt liquors are, of course, not spirituous liquors. I shall appreciate greatly an immediate ruling on this matter.

Yours, sincerely,

I shall not divulge at this time the name of the Member of Congress who wrote this letter, but if it is questioned I am prepared to prove its authenticity, as well as the following, which was received in response:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
OFFICE OF FEDERAL PROHIBITION COMMISSIONER,
Washington, January 27, 1920.

Hon. ————,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ———: Replying to your communication of the 21st instant, you are advised that under the national prohibition act liquor may be prescribed by a physician when necessary, and the limit on such sales is not to exceed 1 pint for the same patient during a period of 10 days. Undoubtedly under said act it is legal to prescribe malt liquors, such as beer, ale, and porter, for medicinal purposes in such quantity as the physician who is in attendance upon the patient deems necessary for the patient's relief. The matter of fixing a limit as to the quantity of malt liquors and wine that may be prescribed is now under consideration, and it is expected that a decision will be reached at an early date, when the public will be fully advised in the premises.

Beer or wine should be prescribed by the physician, and the prescription filled by the pharmacist in the manner now provided by regulation No. 60 for spirituous (distilled) liquor, but it will be understood that the pint limitation is not applicable to the malt liquor and wine.

A copy of the Treasury decision in question is inclosed.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN F. KRAMER,
Prohibition Commissioner.

Those who urge that this measure is an emergency measure find themselves in this attitude: They have come here on the floor of the Senate and insinuated by innuendo that the brewers are making a fight here. The press of the Antisaloon League, its lobby, and its agents have been very busy trying to cast upon those who under their oaths intend to discuss this matter, and to see that it is fully understood before it is voted upon, the stigma that they are not actually engaged in the discharge of their duties, but that they are for lawlessness, that they are against law enforcement. That propaganda, which was so ably discussed the other day by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], when he referred to the activities of certain agencies here at the time we had the coal bill under discussion, is widespread throughout this Nation, and it is sought to impress upon the American people that there are certain lawless Senators on this floor who stand up and want to discuss a measure when, as a matter of fact, it is absolutely necessary to pass this bill in order that some physician may not prescribe a pint of wine to some sick patient, and that in order to do that, as was so ably stated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Congress must sit and hold its breath and pass this bill immediately.

On the other hand, Mr. President, there is revealed here a fact to which my friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] called attention the other day when he referred to the fact that some agent of the Government criticized the Congress for asserting its right to pass upon the refunding of the foreign debts. That is not anything unusual. Since I have been able to follow the course of the Government of the United States, I have learned to know that the Congress creates commissions or bureaus or agencies, and that in creating them it gives them power to promulgate regulations, and immediately that agency of the Congress of the United States will come back and say what the Congress meant, and when it does not suit its purpose will withhold regulations which clearly are within the intent and the purposes of the act which the Congress has passed. So it is in this particular case we find a disregard of the present statutes on the part of those who admitted on January 31, 1920, that a doctor had a right to prescribe beer, ale, and porter. Notwithstanding that, they have absolutely declined to formulate and publish these regulations, and they have kept this fact secret up to this time; but those who desired these permits pressed that department, and upon inquiry I have ascertained that about 10 days before the Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, issued his opinion, this matter was referred to him, although it was absolutely admitted in this letter of Mr. Kramer that ale and porter and beer never were intended to be and were not covered by the prohibition act in effect now.

Mr. President, I can not conceive how Mr. Kramer could write such a letter to a Member of Congress, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, admitting that the law did not permit him to withhold a permit to a physician and then withhold the permits. I want to know under what authority he subsequently withheld the issuance of these regulations.

Mr. President, I have taken this attitude with reference to this bill for very many reasons, one of which is that the Congress of the United States has made the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, through the enforcement agency of this Government, the supreme authority on the question not only of the prescription of medicine but that they have sought, and are now attempting under this very act, to interfere with the legitimate industries of this country, without rendering any account to the Congress of the United States.

But I want to inquire, What is that power which can prevent the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or prevent the enforcement officer of the department under the commissioner, from issuing regulations? I want to know the great power that is controlling these departments, and then, when the Congress asserts itself and wants to discuss the legality of the regulations which they refuse to issue, will say, "Well, the brewery advocates are at work again. They are a lawless set. They are against law enforcement." I ask the Senator in charge of the pending bill if he knew that the commissioner, through the enforcement officer, on January 31, 1920, took the position that beer and wine could be prescribed by a physician to a sick patient without limit?

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator from Louisiana want an answer to that question now?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I would like to have the Senator answer.

Mr. STERLING. I will say that I did not know, and I think there were very few people in the whole country who did know that that was the opinion of the prohibition commissioner at the time; and it was not generally supposed that there was the right to prescribe beer and wine until the opinion of the Attorney General was rendered.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, that is the opinion of the Senator, and I accept it to be absolutely true, because I know he would not make a statement which was not absolutely according to the facts as he understood them. But the facts are, nevertheless, that the department, within 11 days after this law went into effect, decided what it meant. Not only did it decide that but it wrote this letter, and I want to add at this time that the Member of Congress to whom this letter was addressed is a man who voted for the eighteenth amendment, a man who voted for the national prohibition act, and a man who voted for what you gentlemen are pleased to term the antibeer law, but which I claim to be an antiprescription law; and, further than that, a law intended to interfere with the legitimate industries of this country, notwithstanding the fact that it has been amended since introduced in the House of Representatives. I propose to prove those facts to be true when I discuss the bill.

But, Mr. President, is it not time for the American people to know, is it not time for the American people to realize, that when the Government of the United States, through its Congress, has enacted laws which everybody is called upon to respect, and then has intrusted the enforcement of those laws to an agency of the Government, Wayne B. Wheeler or the Antisaloon League people have no authority to intervene and to stop the functioning of the Government according to the spirit and the letter of that law as admitted by them?

These gentlemen have overreached themselves. I would not want to use the names of Senators on this floor, but it has been told to me that Mr. Wheeler, acting for the Antisaloon League, has, since this administration went into power, gone to the enforcement officer of the Government and insisted upon naming the enforcement directors in the different States of this Union; and I think he did that during the previous administration, because I know that these regulations would have been issued except for his intervention in the matter. I even know of a case where he has opposed the appointment of a man in a State where the Senators and all the Members of Congress were united in the indorsement of the man. In this connection I call the attention of the Senate to an article in the Washington Herald of July 25, 1921, under the heading "Senator Protests Dry League's O. K." The article reads:

Senator SPENCER, of Missouri, has written a letter to Internal Revenue Commissioner Blair protesting against alleged influence of the Antisaloon League in the appointment of prohibition enforcement officers.

SPENCER's letter was written when he learned that one of the candidates for the office of prohibition director in Missouri had promised to resign if his services were unsatisfactory to the league.

In other words, the only purpose that Mr. Wheeler, acting for the Antisaloon League, can have in this matter is that he shall impose upon the man before his appointment the condition that if his services are not satisfactory to the league he will tender his resignation. I read further from the article:

"Such an abdication of authority is indefensible," wrote SPENCER. "To allow the State superintendent of the Antisaloon League, or any other individual or official, to have absolute veto power upon appointments can not be tolerated."

The letter which Dr. E. H. Lindley, the candidate, is said to have addressed to Rev. W. C. Shupp, State superintendent of the league, said in part—

Here is what the man who expected to get this appointment had to comply with; here is a pledge he had to take before Mr. Wheeler would agree that he could be appointed:

"I want you to be thoroughly satisfied of my determination to conduct the affairs of the office of prohibition director to the full satisfaction of the prohibition forces and assure you that I will appoint no one to any position in the department who is not fully approved by you; and in case my administration is not entirely satisfactory I will, upon request, submit my resignation."

So that the Congress, Mr. President, is now witnessing the spectacle of one of the lobbyists, men who were so ably denounced the other day and whom the law of this land denounces, whose business it is to sit in the gallery every time the beer bill is called up, after having prevented the enforcement through a previous administration of the law which was passed by the Congress, now before you saying that there is an emergency which makes necessary a law which he likes, because he refuses to permit his agents, who are Government agents, to carry out the spirit of that law; and then, when Senators stand up in their places and ask for time to discuss this matter they are denounced as supporters of the breweries, as favoring lawlessness.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator know the age of Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does he know how long he has been a prohibitionist?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does he know how much he is paid to be a prohibitionist?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I would like to know that. Just in line with that, it might be of great interest to the Nation to know what he is getting, and the source of the money which pays him. I have an idea, after reading the Volstead Act, junior, offered in the House, which was intended to regulate the production of industrial alcohol, that Mr. Rockefeller fears the development of the alcohol engine, which in time will displace the gasoline engine, and for that reason is contributing largely to the salaries which Mr. Wheeler and others are getting. This matter will be established in due time. I expect, if I live to see my term of six years expire, it will be demonstrated on this floor within that time that John D. Rockefeller is not contributing his money for moral uplifting, but for the purpose of protecting the business in which he accumulated his large fortune.

Mr. President, I believe that all law-abiding citizens of this Nation, whether they be prohibitionists or not, should take warning from the facts revealed in connection with the conduct of this department. We have a condition which is intolerable in a free country such as ours. We can not permit lobbyists to place in power and to place at the head of the law enforcement departments of this country men who will construe the law, not according to the way Congress enacts it, but in accordance with the ideas these people have in urging their enactment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does the Senator object to the present law because it does not authorize the prescription of denatured alcohol to human beings? The Senator is talking about the kind of alcohol with which alcohol engines are run.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am very glad the Senator from Florida has asked that question, and I want to ask the Senator from Florida if he knows what denatured alcohol is.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I never sampled any of it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. How is it made?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know how it is made. I have steered clear of it up to the present time, and I think I will continue to do so.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I know the Senator will, and after I read him what it is I know he will, even if his disposition were to go to it. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. Here are the formulæ prescribed by the Internal Revenue Bureau:

Formulæ prescribed by Internal Revenue Bureau which druggists and pharmacists must observe in compounding so-called "medicated alcohol" for rubbing, bathing, and general household uses. All the denaturants are considered poisons and the Government requires a poison label to be affixed to the containers thereof.

There is a list of all the denatured alcohols, and I had intended to cover that, because I want to show that there is ample ground for my assertion that this is not an antibeer measure, but is an antiprescription measure; and when I say antiprescription I mean for lawful purposes, which are medicinal purposes. Let me read this. The first on the list is:

Bichloride of mercury, 1 part; alcohol, 2,000 parts.

That is one of the denatured alcohols. Another one is:

Bichloride of mercury, 0.8 gram; hydrochloric acid, 60 c. c.; alcohol, 64 c. c.; water, 300 c. c.

The "c. c." means cubic centimeters. The third is:

Bichloride of mercury, 1½ grains; hydrochloric acid, 2 drams; alcohol, 4 ounces.

The fourth formula is:

Formaldehyde, 2 parts; glycerin, 2 parts; alcohol, 96 parts.

The fifth is:

Carbolic acid, 1 dram; tannic acid, 1 dram; alcohol, 1 pint; water, 1 pint.

The sixth is:

Alum, one-half ounce; formaldehyde, 2 drams; camphor, 1 ounce; alcohol and water, each 1 pint.

The seventh is:

Liquor cresolis comp. (U. S. P.), 10 c. c.; alcohol, 1,000 c. c.

I will say to the Senator from Florida that under this law as framed, if the Senator from Florida were tempted to try one of these denatured alcohols, and were to drink it, the authority is vested in the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to outlaw even this poison and to force a change of this formula.

What I wish to discuss is the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and, I think, by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and possibly by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], to the effect that the limitations on alcohol did not interfere with the prescription of alcohol for other or external purposes. I wish to make the statement that anyone who knows, and everyone on the floor does know, what the elements are, and also knows that the United States Government even requires that druggists shall put upon the bottles the word "Poison," because they are poisonous.

There is no one here, whether he has ever heard of medicine or not, who would want a member of his family suffering with typhoid fever and needing an alcohol bath to be rubbed down with one of those seven formulas that are presented, because they are the vilest poison. I have been informed by a practicing physician that he has attempted that, and after having applied three or four baths to different people his hand peeled off and swelled up, which is easily understood, and, therefore, that it is injurious to the sick person, of course. I do not think any well man would want to take a bath with those poisons. If I remember anything about treatment, there are cases where the patient is too weak to take quinine internally, and I have seen them rubbed with quinine in order to reduce their fever. If that be the practice with any drug at all, the penetrating properties of the drugs which are in solution in denatured alcohol are bound to be taken into the system through that method of application.

I am very glad the Senator from Florida asked the question. Now I am glad to yield to any other question he may desire to ask.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, I was merely jesting with the Senator a little, but in view of the fact that he is so admirably qualified as an expert on the question I should like to know if the same kind of alcohol that is used for generating power in a human being is the kind that is utilized for the purpose of generating power in a gasoline engine. The reason why I ask that question is because he charges Mr. Rockefeller's interest in the matter, owing to the fact that he is afraid if this bill is not passed he will have the sale of gasoline diminished.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I did not understand the Senator's question. Is he talking about alcohol which is generated in his system or alcohol which is generated in a still?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I asked the question as to the difference between the alcohol which generates power in a gasoline engine and that which is taken into the human system and generates power in the human system and causes additional activities on the part of the human system. I should like to know if there is a difference between the two kinds.

Mr. BROUSSARD. From the question asked I should think that the Senator would know that there are now engines which are operated by alcohol. If the Senator has any question to ask about engines, I shall be very glad to supply him with that information at some other time. I hardly, believe, however, that the Senator from Florida would stand in his place on the floor of the Senate and put into the RECORD a statement to the effect that it is not possible to operate an engine with alcohol. If the Senator were to take that position and would say that he was in earnest, I would simply pass it by without notice, because there are too many really important questions to be discussed here.

So far as the effect upon the system is concerned, I could testify about that, but I know that the alcohol in my system acts differently from the way it acts in the body of my friend from Florida, and I have never seen him in action, either.

However, to get back to the subject, I wish to assure Senators—

Mr. TRAMMELL. I acknowledge that I am not an expert on the subject, so my friend from Louisiana could lead me far adrift and far astray on the question if he were to attempt to do so.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I could easily convert the Senator if his mind were open, but I think he is pledged to vote the other way, so I shall not lose any time on him. I am always glad to be interrupted by the Senator, even in a jovial way. Of course, I do not blame the Senator, who, wishing to advocate the bill, attempts to joke it off, but to me it is a serious matter.

I wish to show, first, that the provisions of the pending bill propose to cut down by one-half the amount of alcohol which may be prescribed by a physician.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BORAH in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. MOSES. Before the Senator takes up a discussion of the measure in detail, section by section, he having already discussed the question of the regulations under which the law has been administered, I wish to call attention to the fact that I have pending before the Senate a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury to send to the Senate the regulations which are reported to have been prepared by the Bureau of Internal Revenue providing for the use of malt liquors and wine for medicinal purposes. I intend to call up that resolution at the earliest opportunity and ask for the action of the Senate upon it; but in the meantime, as a commentary upon the manner in which the law has been enforced, I wish to read from a letter which I received this morning, as follows:

We notice that you have offered in the Senate a resolution calling upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to submit the draft of the tentative regulations governing the use of beer and wines for medicinal purposes. Your action has prompted us to place before you a copy of our issue of April 7 last, where you will find printed the full text of these regulations as drawn by the Internal Revenue Bureau. We do not believe this text has been printed in any other place. We call your attention, further, to the fact that the regulations is appended a memorandum for the Secretary of the Treasury written by the commissioner which interprets the provisions.

This letter is signed by Homer Joseph Dodge, editor of the Publicity Corporation of Washington. Accompanying the letter is a copy of his publication to which he refers, dated Thursday morning, April 7, 1921, and containing, beginning on the first page and running over to the second and third pages, what purports to be the full text of the revised wine and beer regulations, and so forth.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senate of the United States, considering a measure dealing with this very question, has not been put in possession of those regulations, and yet the regulations are printed in full in the Federal Trade Information Service, a publication maintained by the Publicity Corporation.

In order that the regulations as printed by this private concern and denied thus far to the Senate may have further publicity and the acquaintance of the Senate, I ask that they may be printed in the Record, so that if the Senate shall adopt my resolution at some later day we may know whether this private concern was able to get an authoritative text of regulations which the Senate itself has not yet obtained. For that purpose I ask that it may be printed in the Record.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I shall have to object. This only purports to be a publication by some private concern. It is under no public authority at all that it has been published or printed in any periodical. It can not be said that these are the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Furthermore, I think it altogether improper that at this time in the discussion there should be put into the Record that which is alleged to be regulations prepared by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in advance of his issuance of those regulations.

I think that if a resolution should be passed here asking the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with regard to those regulations, he might have reason to say in advance of their issue that it is incompatible with the public interest that regulations, which he is now preparing or which he contemplates issuing some time in the event of the passage of this bill, should be now published or sent to the Senate for their consideration. In addition they are immaterial to any issue before the Senate, and therefore I object.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from South Dakota that these regulations are not inconsistent with the present law, and that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has had no backing and no authority, and there is no law which protects him in withholding from the public and from the Congress regulations based upon the law which has been admitted since January, 1920, to be clearly within the province of that department.

Mr. STERLING. Let me say to the Senator from Louisiana that they are not regulations. They are not yet issued by the commissioner. Regulations prepared and lying upon the commissioner's desk are not regulations. They do not govern anyone.

Mr. MOSES. May I say to the Senator from South Dakota that his bill is not a law until it has passed, and these regulations may show that his bill is absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. It is clear upon the face of it that the Senator from New Hampshire can not be right. The bill prohibits the prescribing of beer for medicinal purposes. For the purposes of my objection that is all the bill does, and that is the only issue before the Senate so far as these alleged regulations are concerned.

Mr. MOSES. There is still the stigma passed upon the medical profession. I do not happen to have the floor. It belongs to the Senator from Louisiana at this time, but inasmuch as the Senator from South Dakota objects to the printing of the regulations, I will ask the Senator from Louisiana to be good enough to read them in his speech so they may appear in the Record, and so we may have the benefit of having the text of them so that if the Senate shall later pass my resolution we may see whether the Publicity Corporation was able to obtain them at a time when the Senate could not.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Provided I do not lose the floor, I do not object to yielding to the Senator from New Hampshire so he may read the regulations.

Mr. MOSES. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana if he will not be good enough to read them.

Mr. BROUSSARD. At a later moment in the course of my remarks I shall read them. I wish now, however, to proceed with my argument as I had started to do.

I wish to lay this proposition before the Senate, that although it is claimed this is an antibeer measure, its provisions reduce by 50 per cent the quantity of alcohol which may be prescribed for internal use. That is a matter of serious import in cases of pneumonia, for instance, and similar serious cases. I am amply supported by evidence that I have from physicians to the effect that there are certain cases where half a pint of alcohol in 10 days is perfectly useless as a remedy.

The national prohibition act, in section 7, provides that not more than a pint of spirituous liquor may be prescribed by a physician. Under the provisions of the pending bill, that has been changed to provide that only one-half pint of alcohol or one pint of spirituous liquor containing not more than one-half pint of alcohol may be prescribed in any 10 days; so that if one stops to think that spirituous liquor may be as high as 90 or 100 per cent alcohol, which could be prescribed under the law, it will be seen that under the provisions of the pending bill where the alcoholic content prescribable is limited to one-half pint there has been a diminution by 50 per cent of the quantity which may be administered internally.

The very same clause in section 7 of the national prohibition act provided that this limitation was to 1 pint of spirituous liquor to be administered internally, and there was no limit to the amount of alcohol which a physician might prescribe for external use.

Under the present law, the change has been made so as to limit the quantity of alcohol which the physician may prescribe not only to one-half pint for internal and external use but the regulation has been so worded that if any wine is prescribed the total aggregate of spirits or of alcohol prescribed for internal use, either in the form of whisky or in the form of wine, added to the quantity prescribed for external use, shall be, in all, limited to one-half pint.

The portion of my argument which I intended to make with reference to the use of denatured alcohol for external use was brought out in answer to the question of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I wish now again to say to Senators that denatured alcohol is a very dangerous alcohol for physicians to prescribe even for external use.

Mr. President, I think that several of the Senators on this floor, men of very eminent qualifications, Senators of the standing of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and others have expressed the opinion that this proposed law would not be constitutional. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] sought to answer that argument and to show that it would be constitutional. I know that this phase of the subject will be discussed again by other Senators, but I do not care to pass by such an important feature of the bill without making some comment.

The Senator from Montana, in support of his contention that under the eighteenth amendment Congress has the power to prevent a physician from prescribing beer, I think, argued from the point of view that it was an implied power which the people have delegated to Congress. I think, in support of his contention, the Senator read a case which came, I believe, from Mississippi, where the Supreme Court of the United States held that a law which had been passed by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, which was authorized and had a right under its constitution or under the powers which the people had reserved when it went into the Union to provide that no physician could prescribe beer.

Without having studied particularly the constitution of the State of Mississippi, I will say that, so far as I can see, the only basis for such a construction placed upon a statute preventing the prescription of beer would be under a power which the people of Mississippi had retained to themselves, and which is commonly called the police power. However, we have in the Federal Constitution no such police power. The principle of this Government has been that all of the powers not specifically granted to the Government of the United States were reserved to the respective States and the people of those States.

We have the eighteenth amendment, but I do not think the eighteenth amendment conveys to the Congress of the United States anything but a very limited and specific power with reference to the question of prohibition. In carrying out the argument in support of the pending bill, in response to a suggestion the other day of the Senator from Arkansas, I think, who inquired of the Senator from Montana whether or not there was a distinction between the power of a State to prohibit the manufacture and the prescription of beer, and the power of the United States to do likewise, the answer was made that, as to the powers which the people of the United States had delegated to the Congress of the United States to regulate interstate commerce, the legislation having been construed by the Federal courts to mean that there was also delegated the power, if it was found necessary properly to carry out that delegation, to interfere with intrastate shipments, by analogy the same power was intended to be conveyed under the eighteenth amendment. In this connection I desire to submit this very practical proposition: Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that the delegation of power to the Federal Government to regulate interstate commerce had been limited to the delegation of power to regulate interstate commerce, say, in coal, and had stopped there. Is there a Senator on this floor who would contend that such a delegation of power to Congress to regulate interstate shipments of coal would also of necessity carry the regulation of the interstate shipment of agricultural products? I do not think anyone would ever take that position.

If in the particular grant of power under the eighteenth amendment the people had delegated to Congress the power to regulate the use of alcoholic liquors without any limitation, without any restriction, by an unlimited grant of power, such as was done in the case of interstate commerce, then the argument made by the Senator from Montana would be supported, at least, by a case analogous to the one under discussion. That, however, is not the case here. The people of the United States did not even grant the power to Congress to regulate the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors. As a matter of fact, if it had done that I doubt whether the eighteenth amendment would have been enacted into a law. There were, however, two limitations. The first was that the people of the United States granted to Congress the right to regulate the use of intoxicating liquors. It was a specific and restricted delegation of power, as if in the case I have previously mentioned the people had granted the right to regulate commerce with reference to agricultural products or to coal products or to any specific line of industry.

The limitation in the eighteenth amendment goes further. There is another limitation put upon the power of Congress in the eighteenth amendment, and that is that the Congress is delegated simply with authority to regulate the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for "beverage purposes."

There was never any other grant of power to the Congress, even incidentally, by implication or by any other method of reasoning or logic which appeals to me. I think that limitation of power is absolutely binding upon any act of Congress. Not only that but consider the intent of the very Members of the House and the Senate who voted to submit the eighteenth amendment to the States. They were the same men who enacted the national prohibition act which is now in force, and when they undertook to enact that measure they stated in its title that it was to regulate the manufacture, transportation, and use of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes and to encourage the use for all other purposes for which alcohol was known at that time, specifically so stating.

Mr. President, I do not think anybody will claim that the enactment of the eighteenth amendment abrogated any other amendment to the Constitution. The eighteenth amendment did not repeal any other amendment; it was not intended so to do. The tenth amendment to the Constitution is really a part of the Bill of Rights of the American people, which they adopted just so soon as Congress met after the ratification of the Constitution. The very first thing that the Congress did was to submit the first 10 amendments which were ratified by the States. The tenth amendment reads:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Now, let us see if there is anything in the eighteenth amendment which is in absolute conflict with or contradictory to the tenth amendment. The eighteenth amendment is not a broad, unlimited grant of power to the Congress, but it is limited to such an extent that nobody in the country believed that an effort would ever be made to regulate the use of alcohol in the practice of medicine or in industrial pursuits in this country. That amendment reads:

After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

I submit to you, Mr. President, and to the Senate that the case discussed by the Senator from Montana where broad, unlimited power had been delegated to a State legislature has no application here.

In answer to another question, I think, the Senator from Montana said that Congress had already regulated the doctors with reference to prescribing medicine, by that inferring that, under the narcotic law to which he referred, doctors are prohibited from prescribing narcotic drugs. I have the narcotic law before me, and there is not a word in it which prohibits a doctor from administering any of the narcotics to any patient; to the contrary, I find that under that law a doctor may carry narcotics in his pocket, or in his valise, or in his medicine case, or whatever it may be called; he may carry narcotics in his automobile; he may carry them and not even have them labeled; and not only that but his chauffeur may carry them for him.

I ascertain that under that law a doctor, finding somebody needing a narcotic, may administer it directly without the writing of a prescription. I find that the only inhibition in that law is that a doctor is not permitted to prescribe a narcotic to a person who is not sick; that he is not permitted to prescribe it except directly to the patient; or, if a narcotic prescription must be filled by a pharmacist, the doctor must then write the prescription and must keep a record of it, and the pharmacist must also keep a record of it. There is no analogy there. The doctor is not any more restricted now in the prescription of narcotic medicines to patients than he was previous to the time when the narcotic law was enacted. If he thinks that a patient needs a narcotic, he need tell nobody, but may administer it. If he must give the patient a prescription, then the law steps in and says, "We want to control the prescription; we want to follow it up; we do not want a prescription to be given to a sick man and another man to get the drug." That is the only limitation, and there is no analogy there. There is nothing there in the interpretation of this act which would warrant anyone in the belief that the courts would hold that this law is parallel, and there is no analogy at all.

Now, I want to come to one phase where I am satisfied that the proponents of this bill do not realize what they are doing when they, under the pretext of saving the face of a set of officials who have been absolutely disregarding the law since January 31, 1920, and whose duty it is to issue regulations, are claiming that this so-called beer bill is an emergency bill. I say I am sure they do not realize what is contained in this bill.

Take line 13 of page 2, Mr. President, and you will find that it says:

If the commissioner shall find after hearing, upon notice as required in section 5 of title 2 of the national prohibition act, that any article enumerated in subdivisions b, c, d, or e of section 4 of title 2 of said national prohibition act is being used as a beverage, or for intoxicating-beverage purposes, he may require a change of formula of such article, and in the event that such change is not made within a time to be named by the commissioner he may cancel the permit for the manufacture of such article unless it is made clearly to appear to the commissioner that such use can only occur in rare or exceptional instances—

And so forth.

Mr. President, subdivisions b, c, d, and e, referred to, of the national prohibition act relate to the following. This is section 4 of the national prohibition act:

The articles enumerated in this section shall not, after having been manufactured and prepared for the market, be subject to the provisions of this act if they correspond with the following descriptions and limitations, namely:

- (a) Denatured alcohol or denatured rum produced and used as provided by laws and regulations now or hereafter in force.
- (b) Medicinal preparations manufactured in accordance with formulas prescribed by the United States Pharmacopoeia, National Formulary, or the American Institute of Homeopathy that are unfit for use as beverage purposes.
- (c) Patented, patent, and proprietary medicines that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.
- (d) Toilet, medicinal, and antiseptic preparations and solutions that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.
- (e) Flavoring extracts and sirups that are unfit for use as a beverage, or for intoxicating beverage purposes.
- (f) Vinegar and preserved sweet cider.

Those substances which are manufactured from or are the products of alcohol, or which contain alcohol, under the national prohibition act never were intended to be interfered with; but the enforcement department and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue have been trying, ever since this law went into effect, to limit the production and sale and use of a great many household products. I have in mind an antiseptic which is known in the South as Tichnor's antiseptic. It is a product which was known long before I was born. It was a household article, used as an antiseptic, and used possibly by 90 per cent of the people in my section of the State, and I should not be surprised if it was used in Mississippi and Texas and the other adjoining States; and still I know it to be a fact that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue put this article under ban, and it required the activities of the United States Senators and the Congressmen from my State immediately after this law went into effect, because the commissioner had called upon the manufacturer of this article to change his formula.

We have something like five or six thousand different articles, some of them foods, others household medicines, others connected with the industries of this country, which absolutely depend upon the use of alcohol; and under this law which you term an anti-beer measure, if it is reported to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that somebody is reckless enough or is insane enough to drink a bottle of one of these medicines not intended for beverage purposes, the commissioner is empowered to call up this man and say to him: "You have been manufacturing this stuff for 75 years. It is a commonly known remedy; everybody uses it; but I found that a man who wanted to commit suicide, or a man who thought he wanted to get drunk, was crazy enough to drink it, and I am vested with power now to notify you that if you do not within 30 days change your formula, proceedings will be taken against you, and you may go to court; but I am authorized under the law to debar this article and to prevent its manufacture."

I am tempted to revert all the time to that spirit among some of the Members of this body who think that all of these things are said in justification of the doctor who wants to violate the law, and who in possibly one case out of 10,000 or 100,000 will let a man have a bottle of intoxicating liquor; but these are very serious problems.

They affect the very industries of this country. I have been studying this matter since this law came here, because I never fully agreed, for instance, with the absurd proposition that forty-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol in a beverage is not intoxicating, but fifty one-hundredths of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume in a beverage is intoxicating. Those things are so repellent to one who wants to interpret an article of the Constitution honestly, who wants to try to ascertain what the people meant when they ratified this amendment, that I have been looking into that subject. I find that there are thousands of people whose business will be materially affected if the power is granted to the commissioner to come to a firm which has been engaged in some instances for two or three generations in the manufacture of something which prior to this act nobody ever thought of drinking, but now, due to your ridiculously severe laws, somebody may avail himself of the alcoholic content of that article and drink it to his injury, and say to these people who have millions of dollars invested in that line of industry: "We are going to revoke your formula for a perfumery or a tonic or a flavoring extract or other like product"—even the tires that are manufactured for automobiles, and all of the various thousands of articles in which alcohol plays a part as a solvent. You are going to permit the commissioner to hale these fellows up before him in cases of that kind.

You will say, of course, as you always say, "Why, he will not abuse that power"; but that does not settle the question. Where are the people engaged in these industries to find the money to finance themselves in the face of a law which it is proposed to pass at the behest of the lobbyist of the Anti-Saloon League, who reports to the commissioner that somebody drank a bottle of poison, and he calls upon this industry that is legitimate, that is working as one of the industries competing with foreign competitors, and says: "I find that six fellows somewhere got drunk on that," and tells them to change their formula. Why, where would they get the money to carry on that business? How can you explain that and justify your pretended anti-beer regulation?

You are going much further than you think you are going, and the chemists of this Nation are watching you. You may produce thousands of selected indorsements of physicians who have nothing else to do, but I am here to tell you that the real practitioner in this Nation is too busy to fool with your foolish laws. He is going about his way, relieving suffering, and when necessary, disregarding your laws. He does not stop to see what you are doing here; but when you interfere with his legitimate practice, and when you interfere with the industries of this Nation, and when the chemists of this Nation explain to the American people what it means to them, you will be sorry that you ever advocated any of these measures.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes; I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator allow me at that point to have read from the desk a telegram stating the position of some of these manufacturers of flavoring extracts and fruit sirups? I have a good many communications on that point.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The reading clerk read as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., July 7, 1921.

HON. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We strongly protest House bill 7294, supplement to national prohibition law, containing the following amendment:

"If the commission shall find that any article enumerated in subdivisions B, C, D, or E of section 4 of title 2 of the national prohibition act is being purchased for use as a beverage, or for intoxicating-beverage purposes, he may require a change of formula of such article or cancel the permit for the manufacture of such article, unless it is made clearly to appear to the commissioner that such use can only occur in rare or exceptional instances; but such action of the commissioner may, by appropriate proceedings in a court of equity, be reviewed as provided for in section 5, title 2, of the national prohibition act."

As manufacturers of flavoring extracts and fruit sirups for soda fountains it is absolutely necessary to use nonbeverage alcohol in flavoring extracts and less than half of 1 per cent in fruit sirups to cut natural oil in fruit. Have no objection to national prohibition law, but this amendment if passed would disastrously affect our business. Urge you to examine bill carefully and vote against amendment.
LOGAN JOHNSON (LTD.).

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator permit me to have read into the RECORD at this point, on the subject referred to by the Senator from Connecticut, a telegram from Mr. H. B. Thompson, the general counsel for the proprietary medicine people of this country?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the telegram.

The reading clerk read as follows:

PIEDMONT, OHIO, July 7, 1921.

HON. FRANK WILLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Volstead bill as now amended by Senate committee is satisfactory to proprietary association and will be pleased if it is given early consideration.

H. B. THOMPSON.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, the article referred to in the telegram which the Senator from Connecticut had read refers to that power which is vested with the commissioner, and we have no assurance that this commissioner will ever think or ever be convinced that they are not violating the law when somebody happens to think so little of his life that he will endanger it in order to get a little bit of alcohol.

But what can you expect of the justice which the commissioner will mete out to these industrial people if the commissioner, who must be satisfied that this can not happen often, is an officer such as the facts disclose the past and present commissioners to be, who, notwithstanding that everybody admits that these permits should be granted to the physicians, withholds from the public the very regulations which have been prepared, and then, when the Attorney General issues a statement, persists in withholding them in order that the Congress may pass a law which they would like to see on the statute books? There is no guaranty there at all as to the rights of property owners or of those engaged in industries, and unless these features are removed they will be bound to be repealed later.

Now, I want to touch on one phase of this which has to do with the shipment of alcohol. You will find that in section 5, relating to the imposition of duties upon the alcohol, the House of Representatives provided that if distilled spirits are lost by theft or fire or other casualty while in the possession of a common carrier the tax upon them would not be due.

When this measure came before the Judiciary Committee it read:

This provision shall apply to any claim for taxes or tax penalties.

And the Senate committee inserted the words "not collected," so as to make it read:

This provision shall apply to any claim for taxes or tax penalties not collected that may have accrued since the passage of the national prohibition act or that may accrue hereafter.

As I understand it, most of the industrial alcohol people have never manufactured alcohol for beverage purposes, having a regular line of customers who take their industrial alcohol from them; but since the passage of the prohibition law, the desire on the part of the public to get hold of this alcohol and the inducement to unscrupulous people to steal it, due to the fact of its great value now, has put the alcohol people to great loss because of the theft of alcohol in shipment.

The House sought to protect them by a provision to this effect, that if this alcohol was shipped and was stolen in transit and the shipper could demonstrate that he was not a party to the theft, that there was no collusion between him and the parties who stole the alcohol, the Government would rebate the tax.

The Senate has changed that so as to provide that if he has not paid the tax he will not owe any tax on the stolen alcohol, but that if he has paid it he can not recover it.

It strikes me that that is not fair. In answer to the question which I propounded to the Senator from Montana, his answer was that the proponents of this bill were not interested in that at all; that those who are opposed to it may be; but, so far as they were concerned, they did not care at all about that, and that is the spirit in which the proponents of this bill consider this measure. They forget that alcohol is the most essential of all the ingredients entering into the products of many industries of this Nation. They forget that if we should absolutely stop the manufacture of alcohol to-day we would retrograde a hundred years and that this country would be overrun by foreign manufactured articles. They do not appreciate that alcohol is as essential to the industries of this country as pig iron is to the steel manufacturer. If you destroy the iron mines, you close down the steel factories, and when you close the steel factories you close the foundries of this country and you close the machine shops of this country. They forget that, and they say, "Well, we are not interested in that," intimating, as it were, that we are interested in seeing industrial alcohol stolen while in transit.

That is not the question at all. We are trying to put our manufacturer on the same footing with his foreign competitor in the same line of business. The prohibition director in Alabama might give a man engaged in the manufacture of industrial alcohol the opportunity of shipping, and might wait until his alcohol was delivered, and then, when delivered, collect the tax; but the director in Mississippi might, in his discretionary power, refuse to permit a carload of alcohol to be shipped unless the taxes imposed upon it were paid, and then when it was shipped and stolen on the way, through no fault of the shipper, he, having paid and having been made to pay, would have no abatement of that tax.

We can easily understand that where you have a director in every State in the Union there is no universal way of enforcing the law; that there is no uniform regulation; that the director in one State may permit the shipment to go on, knowing that the firm is responsible and that they may come next week and collect for that; whereas the other man, in the other State, may be arbitrary, and he may say, "You can not ship until you have paid the tax"; and because he can not ship without paying the tax, and because, having paid the tax, through no fault of his the alcohol is stolen en route, he loses it, whereas if he had lived in the other State he would not have been called upon to pay it at all.

When the proponents of this bill stand here and say, "We have no interest in that," they confess that they do not take into consideration the immensely important part which alcohol plays in all of our industries. I would say that there is no man who does not daily come in contact with a thousand articles, the manufacture of which depends upon industrial alcohol. You can not get away from it, and if this Nation, in carrying out this hysterical idea, is going to limit our important industries, is going to impose burdens and restrictions and handicap our industrial concerns in this country, is going to have a commissioner who may at any time call upon them to change their formulas of an article which is a household article, and which everybody in this country uses, and may call upon them to change the formula overnight, then you will absolutely cut off those industries from the banks, so that they can not borrow money to carry on their business, when here in Washington is vested arbitrary and discretionary power to kill their products, just because it is reported that somebody in Kalamazoo drank a bottle of their stuff, which is intended and recognized to be a very good ingredient for other than internal use.

That is what this bill does, and you can not get around it, and there is no reason for Senators standing on this floor and saying, "This is no concern of mine," when, as a matter of fact, a man who has typhoid fever in his home and is told by a good physician or a good nurse to get a bottle of alcohol to give an alcohol bath to his sick child, will be relegated to the use of denatured alcohol to rub that child, and that contains formaldehyde and other powerful poisons, which are already, under the Government regulation, labeled "Poison." When you prescribe such restrictions you indicate that you do not trust your physician, you do not trust anybody in this country, and the people of the United States will not stand for such measures. The doctors of this country will take a hand in this matter unless the Congress comes back to a practicable, sensible basis, and permit doctors to use the medicines which are necessary to save human life; and we must permit our industrial people to compete with foreign manufacturers on a just basis.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand it, distilled spirits, whether for industrial or other purposes, are distilled in bond, just as the beverages were?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. They are kept in bond under the absolute control of the Government until the tax is paid?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Absolutely; and they have increased the tax something like 300 per cent.

Mr. STANLEY. If a distiller distills a thousand barrels of alcohol, it goes into a bonded warehouse, which is under the absolute control of the Federal Government. Is that correct?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANLEY. The warehouse is locked by a storekeeper?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Absolutely under Government control.

Mr. STANLEY. Government guards are around it, and the distiller has no more control over it than he has over the mint?

Mr. BROUSSARD. None at all.

Mr. STANLEY. Suppose by the negligence of the Government officials that warehouse takes fire and that alcohol is burned; under this act it would break the man who owned the alcohol, unless he were a millionaire.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Absolutely. Not only that, but if that alcohol is stolen, no matter how it is stolen, the manufacturer who is supplying a demand which this Congress recognized when the war broke out, as indicated in the national prohibition act, which was to encourage the manufacture and use of alcohol for industrial purposes and for scientific research, loses his investment; and I am going to tell you now that the future of this Nation depends upon the scientific research and the chemical development of this Nation for future advance, just as it did before, as the war demonstrated, and yet it is being used as an excuse and pretext for the passage of a law to stop a doctor from giving a sick man a glass of beer, and you are imposing restrictions upon the very manufacture of the article which you intended, under the national prohibition act, to promote.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that the proponents of this bill inadvertently put this expression "not collected" into the measure, without a realization of its far-reaching effect, because I am not inclined to believe, however much Senators may differ as to the propriety of prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes, that any Senator would be so ignorant of the legitimate use of alcohol for industrial and other purposes as not to want to encourage its manufacture; and, in the second place, not to be willing, when it could serve no legitimate purpose, to mule in ruin the manufacturer of industrial alcohol by virtue of this provision. I wish at this point, not desiring to interrupt the Senator, to ask another question. We will suppose, which I doubt, that the Government would permit the shipment of alcoholic liquor from a bonded warehouse to a consignee without the payment of the tax. Five or 10 carloads of alcohol, worth, say, 40 or 50 cents a gallon, would be on its way between a distillery in Kentucky or Pennsylvania to a dye works in Chicago, or on the way to the manufacturer of some well-known flavoring extract or of some legitimate proprietary medicine concern, or the manufacturer of a perfume, or the manufacturer of any of the thousand and one things in the manufacture of which alcohol is used. On the way that train would be ditched or go through an open draw, or something of that kind, and the entire shipment would be lost, and known to be lost. Under the terms of the bill the manufacturer and shipper of that alcohol, notwithstanding its known loss, would be required to pay 500 per cent more than the alcohol is worth by virtue of the fact that it was lost, though without his fault.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2-o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I have not concluded my remarks, but at the suggestion of Senators who are interested in the farmers' relief bill, as I am also, I prefer to stop at this time and will resume discussion of the bill which has been before the Senate whenever it shall come before the Senate again. I understand the Senator from North Carolina desires to address the Senate on the unfinished business at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Louisiana should proceed. I had expected to speak on the unfinished business at the end of the morning hour, but I am perfectly willing that he should go on if he desires.

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; I prefer to stop at this time.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Heflin	Moses	Spencer
Ball	Hitchcock	Nelson	Stanfield
Brandeggee	Johnson	Newberry	Stanley

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] will proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is well known that I was in the beginning an ardent champion of what is known as the Norris bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I vigorously opposed the proposed recess because I thought the exigencies of the agricultural situation were so great that relief ought not to be postponed. The Norris bill was at that time the only measure pending in the Senate that promised to afford or was intended to afford relief to agriculture. I gave my support to that measure then, but not because it was satisfactory to me, for it was not. I regarded some of its provisions as somewhat radical, but the situation with which we were dealing in my judgment called for a radical measure if it could not be cured by conservative and moderate remedies.

For these reasons, Mr. President, and because I thought that the door would be open to amendments, and that the Norris bill could be perfected and enlarged so as to more adequately reach the situation and possibly more conservatively reach it, I supported the measure. I am frank to say that I supported it not only because of those reasons, but I supported it also because I thought it furnished a good vehicle by which we might force from the majority party, which was responsible for legislation, better terms in behalf of agriculture. I knew that on account of two provisions in the Norris bill, namely, the buying provision and the Government guaranty provision, there was bitter opposition to it on the part of the administration and on the part of a large element on the other side of the Chamber which generally speaks for the administration. I knew, therefore, that it was legislation not desired by the administration, but I knew also that the administration would be afraid, in fact I thought it would hardly dare, to defeat the only pending proposition for the relief of the farmer without offering something equally as good or better.

Mr. President, I wish to make no criticisms of the so-called Norris bill. I would have voted for it if something better had not been offered. I think it has been understood all along, as we have progressed, that that was my position; that I was going to support that bill, although it was not entirely satisfactory, unless something better were offered; but I have said and maintained that something better would be offered, and something better has been offered; in my judgment, something very much better has been offered. I think if I can get Senators to bear with me until I can have an opportunity to fully analyze and explain the provisions of the proposed substitute they will agree with me that it meets the agricultural situation much more effectively than does the Norris bill.

I feel that a great many misunderstandings now exist with respect to the substitute. I have had two prominent Senators, members of the Committee on Agriculture, to speak to me about it, and I have found, from what they stated, that they wholly misunderstood the scope of the substitute.

Mr. President, since the substitute was offered—and even before it was offered, for it was understood that it was being prepared—we have heard very much about its being a scheme formulated in hostility to farmers' relief legislation and with a view of according only sham relief. We have been told on this side of the Chamber that the majority has prepared, presented, and passed through Congress several measures purporting to be in the interest of agriculture, practically all of which have turned out to be of no benefit whatever, and that any substitute that might come here with the approval of the administration, or "the old guard" Republicans in this Chamber, would be of the same character—only sham legislation not in the interest of the farmer but to deceive and mislead him and to sidetrack and thwart legislation in his interest.

I have no doubt that the pressure in behalf of the Norris bill did bring the administration to the recognition of the overwhelming and compelling necessity for measures to relieve the present distressful situation of agriculture in the United States. I have no doubt that until recently, until the disclosures which were made here in connection with the argument and discussion of the Norris bill, and the attention which the subject received throughout the country as the result of the pendency of that measure, and the fact that the administration was confronted with the necessity for some kind of action with respect to the question and could not evade or escape it, caused the administration to set in motion investigations which they had neglected to make in the past with respect to the actual conditions. As the result of those inquiries and investigations and the aroused sentiment and interest in behalf of agricultural relief, I have no doubt in the world that the administration has at last come to a full realization of the necessity of speedily enacting some legislation that will be effective in meeting the exigencies of the situation.

However, Mr. President, I want to say—and I say it with full knowledge, because I have had, I confess, some connection with the framing of the substitute; I have had many conferences with the men who actually framed it and wrote it—that it was not framed according to any dictation from the White House or the Treasury Department, for I have discussed many of the questions with the men who framed it, and have made suggestions, some of which were written into the substitute.

After the administration had become thoroughly aroused upon this subject and had been forced to the admission of the necessity for effective action, inasmuch as it was not desired under present conditions to raise the requisite money by an appropriation out of the Treasury, naturally the eyes of the administration turned to the War Finance Corporation as the agency through which relief could be granted, just as during the war, when it became necessary for us to make large advances to finance war industries and industries contributory to the war, we created the War Finance Corporation for the purpose of financing them. Naturally, I say, the administration turned to the War Finance Corporation, and Mr. Meyer, the head of that corporation, and Director McLean, of my State, who was the managing director during Mr. Meyer's retirement and who has been a director of the corporation ever since it was founded, were asked to draft a measure that would provide adequately for the financing of agriculture—not merely the exportation of agricultural products, as some Senators have told me this morning the substitute contemplates, but for the financing of exports, the holding of surplus products for export, and the financing of the domestic situation with respect to agriculture.

I want to say that the men who drafted this legislation drafted it in a spirit of sympathy with agriculture and not in a spirit of hostility. Not only had I been in conference with Mr. Meyer and Mr. McLean about this matter before we began to discuss the Norris bill, but Democratic Senators from the South have met Mr. Meyer in conference about financing our general agricultural situation. Mr. Meyer not only discussed it with us in a sympathetic manner, but he outlined some plans that were in his mind at that time. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and myself gave him a number of suggestions which, as I called to the attention of the Senator from South Carolina this morning, have been written into this measure. Mr. Meyer became deeply interested. He showed deep interest in the southern situation and recognized that in the cotton belt and the tobacco sections of the South the situation was probably more acute than in any other section of the country.

So he took it upon himself to make a visit to the South. He went from State to State in the South investigating and probing into conditions and trying to advise himself of what could be done, and how it could be done, to relieve the distress which he found actually exists.

I am stating this, Mr. President, with reference to Mr. Meyer because I want to disabuse the minds of Senators on this side of the Chamber of the idea that the substitute has been prepared by unsympathetic minds and that it has any partisan tinge further than the forced attitude of the administration toward doing something that will be effective.

Now, with reference to Mr. McLean, the collaborator of Mr. Meyer in the preparation of the substitute, I want to say that he and Mr. Meyer are two of the most valuable men in the Government service in Washington to-day. They are both broad, patriotic, wise, and experienced, and they have in their combined experience the exact experience and knowledge that we need in the preparation of a measure of this kind. In the city of New York, where he lives, Mr. Meyer has long been recognized as a financier of great ability. He has had large and broad experience in connection with international finance as well as national finance. Mr. McLean is one of the most remarkable men that my State has ever produced. Less than 50 years of age, he is one of the largest farmers in North Carolina and in the South, and a very successful one until last year, when he suffered very severe losses, as all of us did. He is the president of one large banking institution, and a director and, I think, vice president of another. He owns very large stock interests in both of them. He has large interests in two of the largest textile manufacturing establishments in my State, and they have been successfully managed. He has, practically out of his own resources, built a railroad of something over 50 miles, and is operating it with success; and in addition to that he is one of the ablest lawyers in the State. At the time he was called here to Washington to serve the country at a great personal sacrifice he had one of the most lucrative law practices of any man at the bar in North Carolina.

I am stating this because I want the Senate to know that the men who drafted this measure knew what they were doing, knew the situation that had to be met, had the ability to devise legislation to meet it, and had the experience out of which that legislation should be drafted.

Mr. President, no new principle is written in this legislation. Let Senators dismiss from their minds the idea that there is any mystery about it, or any attempt to deceive or mislead anybody, or that it is intended to lay a trap for agriculture. If I had the time I could take the War Finance Corporation act and I could show that most of the provisions of this bill are taken bodily from that act, changing the provisions only to fit the conditions which are sought to be remedied here instead of the conditions which were sought to be remedied and provided for in the original bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the course of the Senator's remarks, and if answering this question at this time will have that effect, the Senator can answer it at the place in his speech that he prefers.

The President stated in his message, when he was referring to the $500,000,000 to be paid to the railroads, the following:

There is no thought to ask Congress for additional funds. Perhaps $500,000,000 will be necessary. The Railroad Administration has, or will have in the progress of funding, ample securities to meet all requirements if Congress only will grant the authority to negotiate these securities and provide the agency for their negotiation.

With this end in view you are asked to extend the authority of the War Finance Corporation so that it may purchase these railway funding securities accepted by the Director General of Railroads. No added expense, no added investment is required on the part of the Government; there is no added liability, no added tax burden.

I want to ask the Senator, since he has given this bill a study, to tell us out of what resources the Finance Corporation is to pay this money.

Mr. SIMMONS. Which money?

Mr. REED. The money to take care of the railroads, which is part of the recommendation of the President. It may be aside from the course of the Senator's remarks. If so, he need not answer. My inquiry is not made in an antagonistic spirit—

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that.

Mr. REED. But I want to know how the Government is going to pay the railroads $500,000,000 without getting the money somewhere.

If it gets it from the Finance Corporation, then where did the Finance Corporation get it? And if the Finance Corporation got it upon Government obligations, and we take from the corporation $500,000,000 of its assets and turn them over to the railroads, will not the Finance Corporation or the Government be obliged to repay the equivalent of that sum to the people from whom the Finance Corporation got it?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, of course, is aware that there is no provision in this substitute with reference to that matter.

Mr. REED. No; but the substance of the President's address was that he wanted to employ the Finance Corporation for two purposes—one to take care of the railroad indebtedness, the other to float this scheme or plan of taking care of agricultural products; the two plans in a sense united. I want to know where the Finance Corporation is to get the money to do either of these things.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will explain that to the Senator.

Mr. President, let me again say that there is no provision in this substitute authorizing the Finance Corporation to lend any money upon advances made to railroads or upon the obligations of railroads, or for the purpose of helping in financing railroads. This substitute, of course, is a practical amendment of the Finance Corporation act, and neither under this substitute, if it is enacted just as it is now before the Senate, nor under the amendment to the Finance Corporation act, which would be in force after its enactment, would it be possible, without additional legislation, for the Finance Corporation to lend $1 to the Government upon railroad securities or to the railroads upon their own security. The powers of the Finance Corporation are restricted to the express purpose specified in the grant of power.

Some time ago we revived that part of the old Finance Corporation act which provided for the exportation of products of all kinds, agricultural and manufactured products alike.

Mr. KING. You rehabilitated it.

Mr. SIMMONS. We rehabilitated it. It was in suspension. It was dormant. We rehabilitated it; but in rehabilitating it we confined it to advances made for the purpose of financing the exportation of products of agriculture or of the factory.

Mr. REED. Where does it get its money?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will get to that, if the Senator please. I can not handle both phases of the matter at the same time.

In this substitute it is proposed to revive the power of the Finance Corporation with reference to making loans to banks that have made advances, and to limit it, just as that power was limited in the original act. In the original act that power was limited to advances made for the purpose of assisting war industries, or industries contributing to the war, and in this substitute the power is confined to loans by the corporation to banks for advances made by banks for agricultural purposes; so that if this substitute is passed the only power which the corporation will possess to lend money at all will be in aid of exportation of manufactured or agricultural products and in aid of agriculture, or, to use the language of the substitute, "advances for agricultural purposes." Therefore, if the railroads are to be helped in the way indicated by the Senator it will be necessary to have additional legislation for that purpose. There can be no question about that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean to indicate by his statement that the exportation must be of agricultural products only?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; oh, no. I said that under the substitute and the act as revived they must be exportations either of agricultural products or of products of the factory. In other words, I said that it revived the power of the corporation with reference to exportations, and in that act reviving this power we gave the right to make these advances not only for exports of agricultural products but for exports of manufactured products.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator to limit it to agricultural products.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. I thought, if the Senator did, he was in error.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I was saying in reference to that is that the twenty-fourth section of this substitute, which deals with loans made by the corporation upon advances made by banks, limits them to advances made in the interest of agriculture; that is, for agricultural purposes.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the question of how the money will be obtained for the purpose of aiding agriculture, or, if there should be additional legislation, including the railroads within the power of the corporation, for the purpose of affording them financial aid, I wish to say to the Senator that the only way in which that corporation can get any money is through the subscription made by the Government to its capital stock and the authority to issue bonds in twice the amount of its capital stock, which is $500,000,000, all of which is owned by the Government. The Government has subscribed the full amount of that stock, and the full amount of $500,- 000,000 has been deposited in the Treasury to the credit of this corporation. Of course, when the corporation acquires securities it can sell them and reloan the proceeds of such sales.

The corporation has done much business, lent a great deal of money, sold some of its bonds, sold some of the securities it had bought when it was functioning formerly, and has bought and sold a great many Liberty bonds. It has now balanced its account with the Treasury, and it has in the Treasury at this time something over $400,000,000, and has on hand a very large lot of securities undisposed of.

Mr. REED. I asked the question because I thought we would get substantially that answer. So, if I understand, the present assets of the War Finance Corporation had their origin in a $500,000,000 appropriation by Congress. That is, Congress took $500,000,000 worth of stock in this institution, and paid for it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Since that was done the corporation has been loaning money, making advances, and has received securities of various kinds, so that if its securities are all good its assets to-day are substantially $500,000,000, partly in cash and partly in securities?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; they have made some profits.

Mr. REED. How much?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not at this moment have the figures.

Mr. REED. Not large profits?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I should think not.

Mr. REED. Has the War Finance Corporation issued any securities in its own name which it has sold and obtained money upon?

Mr. SIMMONS. If it has, it has the credits to represent that money.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think I can answer that question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be glad to have the Senator answer it.

Mr. KELLOGG. During the war they issued $200,000,000 of bonds for one year, and they were paid for when they came due.

Mr. REED. So that they are wiped out?

Mr. KELLOGG. They are wiped out.

Mr. REED. Then we get down to this situation—if the Senator will pardon me just a moment, for I would like to clear this up—the War Finance Corporation has $500,000,000 of assets, partly in cash and partly in securities, but all of that, except some small profits, was furnished by the United States Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true.

Mr. REED. The United States Government owes the people of the United States on bonds which it negotiated for that amount.

Now, it is proposed that this capital now on hand shall be employed for two purposes. One purpose is to pay the railways $500,000,000 in cash and to take the railway companies' bonds for that amount. The other is to employ the capital of the corporation to handle farm products and foreign business. That is right, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Then we are asked to appropriate $500,000,000 more. Is it proposed that the corporation be authorized to issue bonds?

Mr. SIMMONS. In the original act authority was given to issue bonds for six times the amount of the paid-in capital. But the substitute changes that to $1,000,000,000; that is to say, twice their capital stock.

Mr. REED. And is the Government of the United States to be liable for that billion, or not liable?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly not legally liable.

Mr. REED. But the assets of the corporation, to wit, the $500,000,000 which the Government has already furnished, it would be liable for?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. And the Government, if the venture were unfortunate, might lose its original capital stock?

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. REED. And, of course, the Senator knows the Government would not allow the War Finance Corporation to go into bankruptcy and its creditors suffer; that the Government would have to stand back of it, and would stand back of it, no matter what this bill says.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope it would not allow it to go into bankruptcy. It would not be legally liable, and it has been argued by some that it would not be morally liable, but I do hope the Government would make good any losses that might be sustained.

Mr. REED. I just wanted to take one step further.

Mr. SIMMONS. I took that position when the War Finance Corporation act was passed. I take it now. But I want to say to the Senator that the situation we are now trying to relieve, or asking to have relieved by the use of this agency, is just as serious and just as important as the situation we were trying to provide for during the war. The Government's liability will be the same now as it was then.

Mr. REED. I am not arguing against the bill at present; I may vote for this bill. I am just trying to get some facts clear in my own mind, and taking a good deal of the Senator's valuable time to do it. But I think these colloquies sometimes clear up matters. The President has said, speaking of the railway transaction—which is not immediately in this bill, and yet is related to it, because it is proposed to get money from the same fund and the same institution—that we can advance the railroad companies $500,000,000; and he has made the statement "that no added investment will be required on the part of the Government," and "there will be no added liability and no added tax burden." Nevertheless, if that $500,000,000 is taken out of the War Finance Corporation's funds to-day, it would practically leave it without a dollar, would it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; without a dollar until it sold some bonds.

Mr. REED. It can not sell bonds very well unless they are guaranteed by the Government, unless it has some assets.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has assets.

Mr. REED. It will not have any assets if it pays out the $500,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. It will not pay out $500,000,000 without getting $500,000,000 in securities in place of it. If the corporation should do that, its directors would be subject to impeachment and ought to be impeached.

Mr. REED. Is it proposed that the railroads are to give the War Finance Corporation $500,000,000 of securities when this transaction takes place?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will explain to him what I understand to be the nature of this proposed transaction to which he refers.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator would.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am able to do that, because I know that it was originally intended—and there is no reason for any concealment about this—to couple this railroad proposition with the agricultural proposition. But certain friends of the agricultural proposition, who knew of the preparation of this substitute, insisted that that should not be done, and it was not done. But I know what the provisions of that proposed section would have been.

It was not proposed to do what the Senator from Missouri has in mind at all. It was to provide for another situation. The railroads owe the Government of the United States, admittedly, $500,000,000.

Mr. REED. The railroads owe the Government a balance of $500,000,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; admittedly, $500,000,000. Of course, the Government owes the railroads a considerable sum, but it is admitted that the railroads owe the Government that sum, for advances made by the Government during the era of Government control, in the way of improvements, equipment, and the like.

It was proposed that the railroads give to the Government their bonds for that $500,000,000, properly secured. The proposition, as it was incorporated in the draft I saw, was to permit the War Finance Corporation to make a loan to the Railroad Administration, which is a Government agency and the custodian of the $500,000,000 of railroad bonds, and to purchase from the Railroad Administration the $500,000,000 of bonds belonging to the Government and given by the railroads to the Government to cover the railroad indebtedness to the Government.

Of course, I understand that if that were done, if the War Finance Corporation should buy those bonds and pay for them in cash, that money would go into the United States Treasury or it would go into the hands of the Railroad Administration, I do not know which, not having closely investigated it. I assume that probably it would go into the hands of the Railroad Administration. The money might then be available, in the hands of the Government, to be lent to the railroads or to be paid over to the railroads in settlement of any sum the Government might owe the railroads.

That is the nature of that transaction, as I understood it, and I think, as I remember it now—the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] will know whether I am correct or not—that the power of the War Finance Corporation with reference to lending for these purposes was to be confined to loans made to the Railroad Administration on bonds of the railroads held by the Government and in its hands.

Mr. REED. If I understand the Senator—and I just want to get this plain in my mind—the railroads owe the Government half a billion dollars?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. And have given some kind of obligation to the Railroad Administration for that amount?

Mr. SIMMONS. They are to do it, if they have not done it.

Mr. REED. It is proposed now that the War Finance Corporation shall take over those securities, or others issued in lieu of them, and pay the Railroad Administration this sum of $500,000,000 out of its funds, which are Government funds.

Mr. SIMMONS. It buys those bonds.

Mr. REED. The Railroad Administration, then, gets cash in place of bonds it has, and the War Finance Corporation gets bonds in place of the cash it has, and thereupon the Railroad Administration turns the $500,000,000 cash over to the railways.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. REED. So the Government is in exactly the same situation, except there are different agencies holding the debt. When the $500,000,000 goes into the hands of the Railroad Administration, if that organization were to transfer it to the Treasury, then the United States would be whole on the transaction; but if it takes that $500,000,000 and pays it over to the railroads, then that is just the same as a new advancement to the railroads.

Mr. SIMMONS. Payment of the Government's indebtedness to the railroads. The Government owes the railroads more than $500,000,000.

Mr. REED. If that is true, then why all this legerdemain? Why this shifting of securities? Why should we not simply sit down with the railroads, with a pencil and a piece of paper, find out how much we owe them and how much they owe us, and subtract what they owe us from what we owe them, and, having ascertained the balance, proceed to pay it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that is very simple. The railroads, in this refunding agreement with the Government, give their bonds running for 10 years in settlement of their obligations to the Government. I have nothing to do with the policy of that transaction, but that was to be the transaction. The railroads have made an arrangement with the Government by which their debt is extended for 10 years. Now, the Government has those bonds for that debt. It will sell those bonds to get cash to be paid on its indebtedness to the railroads. As I understand Mr. Harding's message, the Government is going to pay a part of its indebtedness to the railroads. In other words, the Government is not asking the railroads for time, but the railroads are asking the Government for time, and time has been accorded them. That is what it means.

Mr. REED. Boiled down, this is the transaction: The railroads owe us $500,000,000 and we owe the railroads more than $500,000,000. It is proposed that we pay the roads what we owe them and give them time on what they owe us. Why, then, all this shifting of securities?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. REED. Just a moment, if the Senator please. The railroads owe the Government $500,000,000, and we propose to extend the time of the payment of that sum for 10 years or more, and to that end we go through this scheme of shifting of securities. Then the Government owes the railroads more than $500,000,000. That sum the Government proposes to pay in cash. In other words, we give the railways 10 years' time on what they owe us and we pay them in cash what we owe them. That is to say, there being a mutual indebtedness, instead of setting one debt off against the other and paying the balance, we pay our side of the account and give the railways time on their side of the account.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the proposition.

Mr. REED. That is a remarkable transaction.

Mr. SIMMONS. The evident purpose of it is to enable the railroads to get some additional money. I have nothing to do with that transaction—

Mr. REED. I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I do not think it has anything to do with this matter to the extent that we are going into it now.

Mr. REED. But the transaction is that the Government shall extend the time of the payment of the debt of the railroads to it and, on the other hand, the Government is to pay the railroads in cash what the Government owes them. That is the transaction which is described in this language:

With this end in view you are asked to extend the authority of the War Finance Corporation so that it may purchase these railway funding securities accepted by the Director General of Railroads. No added expense, no investment is required on the part of the Government; there is no liability—

And so forth.

We have an open account with the railroads. On one side of the balance sheet they owe us $500,000,000. On the other side of the sheet we owe them a sum which is said to be larger. It is proposed to extend the time of the payment of the $500,000,000 which they owe us and to pay them in cash what we owe them. If that does not increase our obligations, then I do not know anything about figures or the English language.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am loath to interrupt the Senator in the midst of his speech—

Mr. SIMMONS. I am glad if the Senator will deal with this proposition. It is his proposition and not mine; I mean it is the Republican Party's proposition and not my party's proposition.

Mr. KELLOGG. The funding of the debt between the Government and the railroads was provided for by the Esch-Cummings law, and it is not proposed and no one has suggested that that law be changed in any respect at all, not in the slightest degree.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like very much to finish this speech this afternoon, but I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask a question to clear the matter in my own mind. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to state that the substitute which he is discussing contemplates including in its terms the payment of $500,000,000 to the railroads, or is that an outside matter?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have been over that repeatedly, but the Senator was not here.

Mr. RANSDELL. The question of the Senator from Missouri I thought indicated that he was tying it up with the proposed substitute.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Missouri asked that question and I answered it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am sorry I was not here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will answer it again, as the Senator from Louisiana evidently was not present. I answered the question and answered it quite fully. The Senator from Missouri then continued his inquiries along other lines. Undoubtedly there is a misapprehension about the matter. I notice that the Senator has had it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not have it, I will say to the Senator. I understood clearly that the bill does not contemplate tying the railroads up with it, but I could not get any other inference from the questions of the Senator from Missouri, and I desired that the Senator from North Carolina should tell me whether I have misunderstood it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had stated to the Senator from Missouri that there is no such provision in the substitute. I had stated to the Senator from Missouri that I had knowledge outside of the President's message that it was to be proposed hereafter to further amend the War Finance Corporation act so as to include advances to railroads, but I stated to the Senator that unless some additional legislation were had there would be no power, as the result of the passage of the proposed substitute or of the present law granting powers to the War Finance Corporation, by which they could advance a single, solitary cent to the railroads.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am very glad to have that explanation. It is quite in accord with my understanding of the substitute.

Mr. SIMMONS. The present power of the War Finance Corporation to make loans is confined to loans made for the purpose of the exportation of products, and the proposed additional powers with which it is desired to invest them would increase their powers only to the extent that they would be authorized to lend for the purpose of aiding or financing agricultural undertakings.

I do not know when it may be sought to further amend this act. I do not think for the present that we need concern ourselves about that. Certainly the railroads are not coupled up with the proposed substitute and certainly Senators in voting for the substitute ought to vote for it upon its merits, and we can take care of any situation that may develop with reference to the railroads in the future.

Mr. President, the line of my discussion, of course, has been very much broken into by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I do not wish to detain the Senate long, but I do wish to make some slight comparisons between the Norris bill and the substitute, and when I say that I mean between the powers conferred under the Norris bill and the powers conferred under the proposed substitute, without reference to whether the one or the other is the better vehicle for the transmission of those powers and their exercise.

The Norris bill confines this power absolutely to the financing of exports. In that respect it is no broader than the present powers conferred upon and now being exercised by the War Finance Corporation. That corporation has power to finance exports. The Norris bill grants only this power. It has some additional provisions, but they do not relate to powers. They do not relate to what powers the two corporations, the one proposed in the Norris bill and the present corporation, may exercise. The powers conferred by the Norris bill and the powers now lodged in the War Finance Corporation in this respect are limited even for the purpose of financing exportations. They both have relation to practically the immediate exportation of products. They both have relation to providing the means by which exportations may take place at the present time, and in that respect neither of them meets the exigencies of the existing situation.

What we need to relieve the situation—and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] will remember that I pointed that out to Mr. Meyer when we were talking about the matter—is a provision to advance money to enable the producer of agricultural products to carry over those products until they can be marketed abroad in an orderly way. The substitute provides for that.

Mr. President, when we revived the War Finance Corporation and gave it certain powers with reference to financing exports, we thought the situation in Europe, with reference to the purchase of our surplus crops—and Europe is our chief market, both for our agricultural products and our manufactured products—would be substantially what it was in prewar times. In prewar times Great Britain and all the leading industrial and textile countries of Europe bought cotton from us during the three or four months in the fall and winter when we were housing and marketing our crops, bought supplies sufficient to last them for a year. In other words, they bought a year's supply in advance. We supposed that would be the way they would buy at this time. Therefore, when we revived those powers in the War Finance Corporation we had that in view and revived them so as to only permit advances to be made for immediate export.

The situation has changed. It has developed that on account of the tightness of money in Europe, on account of the exchange situation, and the general financial and economic condition there, our European customers must buy in the markets of the world just exactly as our jobbers and retail merchants have been doing in this country. They have been buying from hand to mouth, as we express it down South, buying only to supply the needs and requirements of the hour. Europe is buying our products only as they are needed, so we are unable to find a present market in Europe for our surplus products and the owners of these surplus products in this country, unless they obtain some such relief as is now proposed, will be forced to sell that surplus in the markets of this country for whatever it will bring, and that will be whatever speculators in those products wish to pay for them. If we are to escape such a disaster as I have pictured, we must provide some means by which the owners of these surplus products may hold them and carry them over, not for a day or a month, but as long as is reasonably necessary in order to enable Europe and the other markets of the world to take them as they are needed and can be purchased for consumption. The only way in which Europe can take them is as they are actually needed for consumption. It is necessary, therefore, that the advances for exportation shall be on long time. The substitute which is now offered provides this additional power which neither the existing law nor the bill proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] provides. Under the substitute the cotton farmer borrowing money may carry his crop over for two years, if necessary, by a process of renewals, which are provided for in the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the substitute, the Senator from North Carolina would not contend that the farmer could borrow money from the Finance Corporation? He would have to get it from a bank.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the farmer could not borrow the money direct from the corporation, but he would borrow it from a bank, with the understanding at the time it was borrowed that it was a loan that might be extended, if the situation required it, from one to two years or until the situation which made it necessary for him to hold his crop should have disappeared. That is a very important matter.

Mr. President, I confess that if it were a mere matter of financing exportations for which we were providing I should have no particular preference between the substitute and the bill of the Senator from Nebraska; but I want to say, with a full knowledge of the export situation—and I have studied it very fully—that while it is one of the important problems connected with the agricultural condition, it is not by any means the most important problem. Its importance now is not so great as it was at one time. The most important problem to-day is the financing of the domestic requirements of agriculture. Two Senators from the Agricultural Committee, after that committee had a meeting this morning, told me that the substitute, like the Norris bill, dealt only with exportations; that they had had a meeting and discussed the question. They came out of the meeting and told me there was nothing in the substitute that dealt with any other phase of the agricultural question except that of the exportation of products.

Mr. President, I would not refer to that but for the fact that in talking with two other Senators within two hours—Senators who are not members of the Agricultural Committee—the same thought was expressed. I wish to say that if that were true, then I would not be interested in the substitute. But my interest in the substitute, I will say to my good friend, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]—and I want to request him to study that section—is to be found in section 24 of the substitute. The section follows the last word with reference to the powers granted concerning exports. It starts a new subject; and it deals with it, in my judgment, in a very broad, a very comprehensive, and a very satisfactory manner. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska, and to the other Senators who do me the honor to listen to me to-day, that if we should adopt section 24 of the substitute and strike out of the substitute and out of the bill of the Senator from Nebraska every other provision, under that one section—section 24—we should be able to finance the holding of our cotton and tobacco crops in the South; we should be able to place in circulation in those money-starved districts of the South enough money with which to again start the wheels of industry and to restore prosperity.

What does that provision do? That provision, as I have said, has nothing to do with exportations. Senators will remember that when we passed the War Finance Corporation bill we were in sore distress to find means with which to finance the vast and complicated operations of the industries that were engaged in war work in this country. It was found that the banks were inadequate for that purpose; it was found that all the resources of private capital were inadequate for that purpose. It required not millions—up to that time we were dealing in millions in this country—but it required billions of dollars. It was the first manifestation of the fact that this country had passed from a million-dollar basis to a billion-dollar basis in ordinary appropriation language. In order to provide means for financing those undertakings and for the purpose of drawing out all the hidden and hoarded financial resources of the country, and to make them available for this purpose by inspiring confidence, we established the War Finance Corporation, which was backed by the Government, every dollar of its stock being owned by the Government. We provided, among other things—and that was the main provision—that the corporation might lend to any bank or other financial institution which had advanced money for any purpose connected with the war or contributory thereto. It was a very broad power. It was not necessary to exercise it very much. It was stated here upon the floor of the Senate, and I myself, then chairman of the Finance Committee and having this bill in charge, stated upon the floor of the Senate that if we created this Government agency with the power to lend money for this specific purpose, the confidence which would be inspired would bring forth the concealed, the retired resources of the country, and would make it unnecessary that very much money should be lent through the agency thus created. The same thing will be true if we give the corporation the power that it is now sought to confer upon it.

But what I was going to say to the Senate and to the Senator from Nebraska, who I had hoped would see the great value of this provision and either accept the substitute or, if he could not accept all of it, at least accept this portion of it and put it in his bill, was that I do not care who is the author of this bill; I do not care what committee this bill comes from; I am interested in relieving the agricultural situation, and I would as soon vote for a provision that will do that coming from the other side or coming from the administration as I would for a provision coming from this side or from other Democratic sources.

I would just as soon vote for such a measure when it comes from somebody outside of the committee in charge of the subject as from the committee in charge of the subject. So far as this matter is concerned, my view upon it rises above party; it rises above personal preferences, and rises above committee privileges and committee rights. I want to get the best measure possible for the farmer.

Now, I wish to say to the Senate that section 24, which I think is the meat of the whole thing and which is the one thing in which I am most deeply interested in connection with this proposed legislation, simply reenacts in effect the principle underlying the power of the War Finance Corporation with respect to advances for war purposes. It changes that provision only to the extent of striking out in effect "for war purposes" and inserting "for agricultural purposes."

Mr. President, I wish to impress upon Senators for a few moments how far-reaching that will be in its effect upon agriculture. The situation as it exists in my section of the country—and I think in agricultural districts elsewhere—does not confine itself to the farmer. It reaches also the credit man in whatever line of business he may be operating, if his credits have anything to do with agriculture. It reaches, first, the credit supply stores. The Senator from Georgia knows that scattered all over our Southland, in every little village and hamlet and in every little country town, as well as in the larger towns, there are agricultural credit stores, where our tenant farmers and our landlord farmers go and get credit for supplies with which to cultivate their crops, with the understanding that they are to be paid for in the fall when the crop is sold. It takes in the farm-implement man who does the same thing. It takes in the stock-supply man who does the same thing. It takes in the fertilizer man who sells to the farmer upon credit, to be paid when the crop is sold. But all of these different credit agencies, beginning at the store and including the horse and mule dealer and the agricultural-implement dealer and the fertilizer dealer, all of these people who make these credits take the farmer's paper and go to the bank and discount it or hypothecate it and borrow money upon it. Where the landlord has become responsible for advances made to his tenants or where he has to make those advances out of his own pocket, he goes to the bank and borrows the money with which to pay for those supplies; so that all of these institutions of credit connected with the agricultural situation of the country have been forced to have recourse to the banks, and that fact has drawn the banks into the problem.

Last year the farmer was not able to meet his obligations. These different agencies had to go to the bank and secure an extension of credit for another year. In the meantime the process of advancing again on this year's crop has gone on, and the accumulated advances have been taken care of by the bank as far as it can, and finally the bank has reached a condition in which it is impossible for it any longer to carry the burden. It has become necessary that that burden shall be lifted before that bank can again discharge its functions and obligations to the community, to enable that community to carry on the ordinary business in which its people are engaged. The result is stagnation, and bankruptcy in many instances.

Mr. President, that is the situation we must relieve. If this provision is adopted—I do not care whether it is adopted as a part of the substitute, or is incorporated in the Norris bill and adopted in that way—if this substitute is adopted then this corporation, with ample resources, with $400,000,000 in cash in the Treasury upon which it can draw a check to-morrow, with a billion dollars of resources in the sale of its bonds—and the interest is to be adjusted in a way to make those bonds marketable and easily floatable in the markets of the country—with a billion and a half in money to be loaned, this corporation will have no trouble in meeting the requirements of the agricultural situation. The billion and a half may not be all that is needed; but as it lends money this corporation will do now as it did when it functioned before; it will sell its securities, get more money, and this will become a revolving fund. If it lends this money out, it will simply sell some of the bonds and the stock and the securities that it has bought in the course of business and get other money.

I should say that in this way this billion and a half of money would do the work of at least two and a half if not three billions of dollars. If the railroads are added hereafter in a separate amendment, there is no trouble in the world about our increasing the amount of bonds that the corporation may issue. In war times we authorized the corporation to issue in bonds six times its paid-in capital, which would have amounted to $3,000,000,000. We have in this bill reduced the authorization to one billion, twice the capital. We can increase it to three times the capital stock if we want to or four times the capital stock. There is no trouble about it.

Think about this situation, Senators. Under this substitute the corporation is permitted to lend to banks for agricultural purposes on any advances for agricultural purposes not to be made hereafter only but also any advances for agricultural purposes that have been heretofore made. That includes every dollar that the banks have lent to the farmers on their agricultural undertakings.

The banks have not been able to use their securities to the full extent in borrowing from the Federal reserve banks.

I need not go into that. You all understand it. Their vaults have been full of what the Reserve Board has declared to be frozen credits, excluded from the Federal reserve banks by reason of the fact that they were lent upon what the board called speculative ventures; and for various and sundry other reasons which I do not want to take the time of the Senate to recount here, those obligations, covering the advances that the banks made last year and this year, have not, except to a limited extent, been available to them for the purpose of securing money from the Federal reserve banks or from any other kind of bank. Now, these securities will all be made available for the purpose of borrowing money from the Finance Corporation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question? I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want very much to get through, I will say to the Senator, but it is all right. I shall be glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that the Senator is familiar with the substitute, and I want to get his opinion about what it means touching the advancements by the War Finance Corporation to these banks that have made advancements. The Senator has his copy of the bill there. There is a limitation on that proposition, and I should like to get the Senator's idea as to just what it means.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator refer to a limitation on the advances in section 24?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is section 24 to which it applies. I think that is the section dealing with those advances.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. I shall be glad to have the Senator point it out.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not it before me. I remember reading it.

Mr. SIMMONS. After section 24 there follows:

Advances or purchases may be made under this section—

That is, section 24—

at any time prior to July 1, 1922.

Then commences another section, section 25:

The aggregate amount of all advances made under sections 21, 22—

Those sections relate to exports—and 24—

Which relates to domestic matters—

and of all notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other securities purchased under section 24 remaining unpaid, shall not at any one time exceed $1,000,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I have just procured a copy of the bill. Here is what I want the Senator to give me his opinion about, on page 2 of the substitute, at line 23, subdivision (b), about the advancements to any bank, banker, or trust company.

Mr. SIMMONS. That has reference to exports.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not discussing that then.

Mr. HARRISON. I wanted to get from the Senator what he thinks about this provision:

The aggregate of advances made to any bank, banker, or trust company shall not exceed the amount remaining unpaid of the advances made by such bank, banker, or trust company for purposes herein described.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amount remaining unpaid?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It means that the power to borrow is the full limit of the advances made; but if a part of those advances have been paid, then the power to borrow on account of those advances is reduced to the amount remaining unpaid.

Mr. HARRISON. But the bank can never borrow from the War Finance Corporation any more than it has advanced to its customer? Is that the idea?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the idea. It can borrow the full amount that it has advanced for agricultural purposes. It can borrow that amount, but no more than that.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is only one other thing I desire to say at this time.

Senators will notice that in section 24 there is a provision with regard to exceptional cases. It is analogous to the provision in the old War Finance Corporation act which dealt also with exceptional cases. That provision as to exceptional cases is to reach the situation that may be created as to certain State banks in States where, as in my State, there is a limitation upon the amount that the bank may borrow. In my State a State bank is not permitted to borrow in excess of its paid-in capital plus its accumulated surplus. Most of the State banks have already borrowed to that extent and can not borrow any more; but this provision as to exceptional cases in section 24 provides in effect that in such a case the bank having made advances and taken securities for those advances which are held to be adequate may take them to the War Finance Corporation and sell them outright, without indorsement, to the extent that they may hold that they are good and safe security. That may not apply in many States, but it does apply in my State and in some others. It is a very valuable provision for that reason.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I expected, and my presentation has been much more unsatisfactory to me than I would like to have it because I have been thrown off the line of my thought by interruptions.

In conclusion, I wish to say simply that in supporting this substitute I am doing it solely because there is nothing in the world to-day in which I am more interested than in relieving the situation which I know my people are in. My sole purpose is to get legislation here which will accomplish the object I have in view, and I am going to vote without reference to party or without reference to personalities.

When this bill is finally perfected, after all the amendments and substitutes shall have been discussed, I am going to vote for that proposition which, to my mind, will most fully, completely, and equitably meet the existing conditions.

An act (S. 1915) to amend the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, to provide relief for producers of and dealers in agricultural products, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act the term "person" includes partnerships, corporations, and associations, as well as individuals.

"Sec. 2. That section 1 of the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and four additional persons (who shall be the directors first appointed as hereinafter provided) are hereby created a body corporate and politic in deed and in law by the name, style, and title of the War Finance Corporation (herein called the corporation), and shall have succession for a period of 10 years: Provided, That except as otherwise provided by this amendatory act the corporation shall not exercise any of the powers conferred by this act except such as are incidental to the liquidation of its assets and the winding up of its affairs, after six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States."

Sec. 3. The War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, is amended by adding after section 21 thereof the following new sections:

"Sec. 22. Whenever the board of directors of the corporation shall be of the opinion that conditions arising out of the war, or out of the disruption of foreign trade created by the war, have resulted in or may result in an abnormal surplus accumulation of any staple agricultural product of the United States and that the ordinary banking facilities are inadequate to enable producers of or dealers in such products to carry them until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner, the corporation shall thereupon be empowered to make advances, for periods not exceeding one year from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms, not inconsistent with this act, as it may determine;

"(a) To any person engaged in the United States in dealing in or marketing any such products, or to any association composed of persons engaged in producing such products, for the purpose of assisting such person or association to carry such products until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner. Any such advance shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding 1½ per cent in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrower is located at the time when such advance is made;

"(b) To any person without the United States purchasing such products, but in no case shall any of the money so advanced be expended without the United States. Every such advance shall be secured by adequate security of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation. The rate of interest charged on any such advance shall be determined by the board of directors. The corporation shall retain power to recall an advance or require additional security at any time.

"(c) To any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which makes or has made an advance or advances to any such person as is described in paragraph (a) of this section for the purpose therein set forth or which makes or has made an advance or advances to any producer for the purpose set forth in paragraph (a). The aggregate of advances made to any bank, banker, or trust company shall not exceed the amount remaining unpaid of the advances made by such bank, banker, or trust company for purposes herein described. Such advances shall bear interest at the rates fixed by the corporation.

"Sec. 23. Notwithstanding the limitation of section 1, the advances provided for by section 21 and section 22 of this act may be made until July 1, 1922. The corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such advance or advances through renewals, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for the payment of any advance made under authority of section 21 shall not be extended beyond five years from the date upon which such advance was originally made, and the time for the payment of any advance made under authority of section 22 shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such advance was originally made.

"All advances made under section 21 or under section 22 of this act shall be made against the promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments in writing imposing on the borrower a primary and unconditional obligation to repay the advance at maturity, with interest as stipulated therein, with full and adequate security in each instance by indorsement, guaranty, pledge, or otherwise. The corporation shall retain the power to require additional security at any time.

"Sec. 24. Whenever in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the Corporation the public interest may require it, the corporation shall be authorized and empowered to make advances upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine to any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which may have made advances for agricultural purposes, including the breeding, raising, fattening, and marketing of live stock. Such advance or advances may be made upon the promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments, in such form as to impose on the borrowing bank, banker, or trust company a primary and unconditional obligation to repay the advance at maturity, with interest as stipulated therein, and shall be fully and adequately secured in each instance by indorsement, guaranty, pledge, or otherwise. Such advances may be made for a period not exceeding one year, and the corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such advance through renewals, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for the payment of any such advance shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such advance was originally made. The aggregate of advances made to any bank, banker, or trust company shall not exceed the amount remaining unpaid of the advances made by such bank, banker, or trust company for purposes herein described.

"The corporation may, in exceptional cases, upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, purchase from domestic banks, bankers, or trust companies, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other instruments of indebtedness secured by chattel mortgages, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, or other instruments in writing conveying or securing marketable title to staple agricultural products, including live stock. The corporation may from time to time, upon like security, extend the time of payment of any note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument acquired under this section, but the time for the payment of any such note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument was acquired by the corporation. The corporation is further authorized, upon such terms as it may prescribe, to purchase, sell, or otherwise deal in debentures, promissory notes, or other obligations, adequately secured, issued by banking corporations organized under section 25 (a) of the Federal reserve act: Provided, That no purchase of debentures, promissory notes, or other obligations of the said banking corporations shall be made nor any loan or advance be made to said banking corporations except for the purpose of assisting the said banking corporations in financing the exportation of agricultural and manufactured products from the United States to foreign countries. No such promissory notes, debentures, or other obligations shall be purchased which have a maturity at the time of such purchase of more than five years.

"Advances or purchases may be made under this section at any time prior to July 1, 1922.

"Sec. 25. (a) The corporation shall have power and is authorized and empowered, upon request therefor by the Federal Farm Loan Board, created by the Federal farm loan act approved July 17, 1916, as amended, to make advances to Federal land banks, at a rate of interest not exceeding the rate of interest charged by Federal land banks for loans under the provisions of such Federal farm loan act, as amended, and to accept as security therefor farm loan bonds issued by such Federal land banks maturing within five years of the date of issue, or to purchase such bonds from the capital, earnings, reserve fund, or other assets of such corporation to the amount of $100,000,000 during the calendar year ending December 31, 1921, and $100,000,000 during the calendar year ending December 31, 1922.

"(b) Every Federal land bank shall have power, subject to the provisions, limitations, and requirements of the Federal farm loan act approved July 17, 1916, as amended, and of this section, to receive and pay interest upon such advances, to issue farm loan bonds as security therefor, to issue and sell farm loan bonds, to buy the same for its own account at any time, and to retire any or all of such bonds at or before maturity.

"Sec. 26. The aggregate amount of all advances made under sections 21, 22, and 24, and of all notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other securities purchased under section 24 remaining unpaid, shall not at any one time exceed $1,000,000,000.

"Sec. 27. The corporation is empowered and authorized to investigate upon its own initiative or in cooperation with other governmental agencies foreign market conditions and to advise where disposition may be advantageously made of such agricultural products.

"Sec. 29. In order to enable the corporation to carry out the purposes of this act, the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to furnish to the corporation for its confidential use such reports, records, or other information as he may have available relating to financial condition of national banks to which the corporation has made or contemplates making advances, and to make, through his examiners, for the confidential use of the corporation, examinations of banks, bankers, or trust companies, other than national banks, to which the corporation has made or contemplates making advances: Provided, That no such examination shall be made without the consent of such bank, banker, or trust company.

"Sec. 30. No person, bank, banker, or trust company receiving money under the provisions of this act shall loan such money at a rate of interest greater than 2 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of interest charged or received by the corporation upon such money."

Sec. 4. Section 21 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended by striking out paragraphs (b) and (c) thereof, and by striking out at the beginning of the first paragraph the letter (a).

Sec. 5. The first paragraph of section 12 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"Sec. 12. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time its notes or bonds in an amount aggregating not more than four times its paid-in capital, such notes or bonds to mature not less than six months nor more than five years from the respective dates of issue, and may be redeemable before maturity at the option of the corporation, as may be stipulated in such notes or bonds, and to bear such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the board of directors, but such rate or rates of interest shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or bonds shall have a first and paramount floating charge on all the assets of the corporation, and the corporation shall not at any time mortgage or pledge any of its assets. Such notes or bonds may be issued at not less than par in payment of any advances authorized by this title, or may be offered for sale publicly or to any individual, firm, corporation, or association, at such price or prices as the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may determine."

The power of the corporation to issue notes or bonds may be exercised at any time prior to January 1, 1927, but no notes or bonds shall mature later than July 1, 1927.

SEC. 6, Paragraph 1 of section 13 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"That the Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the maturity limitations of the Federal reserve act and to regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to discount the direct obligations of member banks secured by such notes or bonds of the corporation and to rediscount notes or other negotiable instruments secured by such notes or bonds and indorsed by a member bank. Discounts or rediscounts under this section shall be at an interest rate equal to the prevailing rate for eligible commercial paper or corresponding maturities."

Passed the Senate July 27 (calendar day, Aug. 4), 1921.

Mr. NORRIS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for more than an hour,

Mr. CURTIS. Can the Senator complete his remarks to-night? I would like to have a short executive session of the Senate, if the Senator does not care to occupy the floor longer.

Mr. NORRIS. I have just commenced an analysis of the proposed substitute. That was the thing I really took the floor to do, and I have just gotten to it. I shall not be able to finish to-day, unless the Senate sits later than it will probably want to stay here.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, July 28, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND NORWAY.

In executive session this day, the following agreement between the United States and Norway was ratified, and on motion of Mr. KELLOGG the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, an agreement signed on June 30, 1921, between the United States and Norway, for the submission to arbitration of certain claims of Norwegian subjects against the United States arising out of requisitions by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

WARREN G. HARDING.

The WHITE HOUSE, July 1, 1921.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, an agreement between the United States and Norway, signed on June 30, 1921, for the submission to arbitration of certain claims of Norwegian subjects against the United States arising out of requisitions by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Respectfully submitted,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, July 1, 1921.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND NORWAY.

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of Norway, desiring to settle amicably certain claims of Norwegian subjects against the United States arising, according to contentions of the Government of Norway, out of certain requisitions by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation;

Considering that these claims have been presented to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and that the said corporation and the claimants have failed to reach an agreement for the settlement thereof;

Considering, therefore, that the claims should be submitted to arbitration conformably to the convention of the 18th of October, 1907, for the pacific settlement of international disputes and the arbitration convention concluded by the two Governments April 4, 1908, and renewed by agreements dated June 16, 1913, and March 30, 1918, respectively;

Have appointed as their plenipotentiaries for the purpose of concluding the following special agreement:

The President of the United States of America; Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Majesty the King of Norway; Mr. Helmer H. Bryn, His Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The arbitral tribunal shall be constituted in accordance with article 87 (Chapter IV) and article 59 (Chapter III) of the said convention of October 18, 1907, except as hereinafter provided, to wit:

One arbitrator shall be appointed by the President of the United States, one by His Majesty the King of Norway, and the third, who shall preside over the tribunal, shall be selected by mutual agreement between the two Governments. If the two Governments shall not agree within one month from the date of the exchange of ratifications of the present agreement in naming such third arbitrator, then he shall be named by the President of the Swiss Confederation, if he is willing.

The tribunal shall examine and decide the aforesaid claims in accordance with the principles of law and equity and determine what sum, if any, shall be paid in settlement of each claim.

The tribunal shall also examine any claim of Page Bros., American citizens, against any Norwegian subject in whose behalf a claim is presented under the present agreement, arising out of a transaction on which such claim is based, and shall determine what portion of any sum that may be awarded to such claimant shall be paid to such American citizens in accordance with the principles of law and equity.

ARTICLE II.

As soon as possible, and within five months from the date of the exchange of ratifications of the present agreement, each party shall present to the agent of the other party two printed copies of its case—and additional copies that may be agreed upon—together with the documentary evidence upon which it relies. It shall be sufficient for this purpose if such copies and documents are delivered at the Norwegian Legation at Washington or at the American Legation at Christiania, as the case may be, for transmission.

Within 20 days thereafter each party shall deliver two printed copies of its case and accompanying documentary evidence to each member of the arbitral tribunal, and such delivery may be made by depositing these copies within the stated period with the international bureau at The Hague for transmission to the arbitrators.

After the delivery on both sides of such printed case, either party may present, within three months after the expiration of the period above fixed for the delivery of the case to the agent of the other party, a printed counter case—and additional copies that may be agreed upon—with documentary evidence, in answer to the case and documentary evidence of the other party, and within 15 days thereafter shall, as above provided, deliver in duplicate such counter case and accompanying evidence to each of the arbitrators.

As soon as possible and within one month after the expiration of the period above fixed for the delivery to the agents of the counter case, each party shall deliver in duplicate to each of the arbitrators and to the agent of the other party a printed argument—and additional copies that may be agreed upon—showing the points relied upon in the case and counter case, and referring to the documentary evidence upon which it is based. Delivery in each case may be made in the manner provided for the delivery of the case and counter case to the arbitrators and to the agents.

The time fixed by this agreement for the delivery of the case, counter case, or argument, and for the meeting of the tribunal, may be extended by mutual consent of the parties.

ARTICLE III.

The tribunal shall meet at The Hague within one month after the expiration of the period fixed for the delivery of the printed argument, as provided for in article 2.

The agents and counsel of each party may present in support of its case oral arguments to the tribunal, and additional written arguments, copies of which shall be delivered by each party in duplicate to the arbitrators and to the agents and counsel of the other party.

The tribunal may demand oral explanations from the agents of the two parties as well as from experts and witnesses whose appearance before the tribunal it may consider useful.

ARTICLE IV.

The decision of the tribunal shall be made within two months from the close of the arguments on both sides, unless on the request of the tribunal the parties shall agree to extend the period. The decision shall be in writing.

The decision of the majority of the members of the tribunal shall be the decision of the tribunal.

The language in which the proceedings shall be conducted shall be English.

The decision shall be accepted as final and binding upon the two Governments.

Any amount granted by the award rendered shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date of the rendition of the decision until the date of payment.

ARTICLE V.

Each Government shall pay the expenses of the presentation and conduct of its case before the tribunal; all other expenses which by their nature are a charge on both Governments, including the honorarium for each arbitrator, shall be borne by the two Governments in equal moieties.

ARTICLE VI.

This special agreement shall be ratified in accordance with the constitutional forms of the contracting parties and shall take effect immediately upon the exchange of ratifications, which shall take place as soon as possible at Washington.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this special agreement and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington this 30th day of June, 1921.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.
HELMER H. BRYN.

IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive F, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, an agreement between the United States and Norway for the submission to arbitration of certain claims of Norwegian subjects.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 27, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the source of all life and the crown of all earthly glory. Each day bears the map on which are inscribed the tokens of Thy loving kindness. Incline our hearts with reverence and godly fear to seek Thy favor, and in all our ways may we acknowledge Thee. Enable us to speak the words of wise counsel, and grant that Thy truth may be our joy, Thy law our light, and Thy service our glory; and with these gifts of Heaven's graces selfishness shall be destroyed and the higher life magnified. Then shall our refuge be secure and blessed and our lives shall be large, and we shall possess an inheritance that is incorruptible and fadeth not away. In the name of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2301. An act granting the consent of Congress to Old Trail's Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2301. An act granting the consent of Congress to Old Trail's Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Agriculture.

THE PINK BOLLWORM.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up S. J. Res. 72, for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this resolution contains language making an appropriation, which the committee has not jurisdiction to report. I direct the attention of the Speaker to the words on page 2, line 1, "available until expended."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's point of order is to the words "available until expended"?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; that that is an appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN. The appropriation is made for the current year. This proposition is to make $200,000 of the $554,000 available for the payments of rentals of land in the noncotton zones.

Mr. WALSH. Available until expended.

The SPEAKER. Available until expended, whereas unless that particular language appeared in the original appropriation that sum would not be available until expended.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Chair has repeatedly held that the point of order must be directed to the appropriation and not to the bill. I take it there is no question about the committee having jurisdiction over the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to make the point of order to the jurisdiction. The Chair understands he makes it to the appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN. If he makes it to the provision of the bill, I did not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair understood; and unless the gentleman from Iowa can show that a similar phrase was in the original bill, it seems to the Chair that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the act making the appropriation, and there is no language in that act extending the appropriation beyond the current fiscal year.

Mr. HAUGEN. But the bill makes no additional appropriation. It simply contains legislation as to how the money shall be expended.

The SPEAKER. It extends the time of the appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN. As to the time, and how it shall be expended.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This resolution does not extend the time for the appropriation at all. The appropriation was made for the current fiscal year, and this simply removes the restriction from the appropriation and enables them to use a fund already appropriated for the current fiscal year. In other words, I have the original act before me, and it appropriates $554,840—

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the existence of the pink bollworm of cotton in Mexico, and to prevent the establishment of such insect in the United States by the employment of all means necessary, including rent outside of the District of Columbia and the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

The original appropriation act makes this appropriation of $554,840 for the purpose of eradicating the pink bollworm.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow the Chair, that is available, of course, during the present fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The language in this resolution makes it available until expended.

Mr. ASWELL. What effect would it have upon the resolution if the words "available until expended" were stricken from it? Would that relieve the situation?

The SPEAKER. If that language was not in the joint resolution it would not be subject to the point of order.

Mr. ASWELL. What effect would it have upon the resolution?

Mr. HAUGEN. If there is objection to those words, I am perfectly willing to withdraw them.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let me see if I understand the point of order. As I understand, the gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that the committee has not jurisdiction of this joint resolution, or rather has not the authority under the rules of the House to report it, because it extends beyond this fiscal year an appropriation that has been made by Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman made the point of order against the joint resolution but against the appropriation. He claimed that was out of order.

Mr. GARNER. He must have some ground for it being out of order, and I was trying to find what the ground is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman from Texas had been listening, he would have known the point of order that I made, which is that this joint resolution contains an appropriation, and I directed the attention of the Chair to the language indicated, "available until expended," and that that was an appropriation which this committee did not have jurisdiction to report.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand it, then, the proposition is that they make available until expended an appropriation that has been made by Congress, and that that language is equivalent to making an original appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. I will say that there is another point of order when this is disposed of.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that in cases of this kind it would be the duty of the Chair to sustain the point of order when the joint resolution was being read for amendment, but that the point of order does not lie against the consideration of the joint resolution by the House.

Take, for example, the case of an elaborate bill reported by some committee other than the Committee on Appropriations, clearly within the power of that reporting committee, with one exception. After 50 sections of a legislative character, the fifty-first section says "the sum of so many dollars is hereby appropriated." That provision is beyond the power of the committee. A point of order could be raised, and would lie against that section when the bill came up in the House; but it does not seem to me that the jurisdiction of the committee or the jurisdiction of the House to consider the bill is defeated by the fact that there is one provision that is out of order tucked away somewhere within the four corners of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the point of order can be made at any time.

Mr. ROGERS. The point of order can be made at any time, but the point of order should not go to the consideration of the entire bill by the House, as contended by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I have made no such contention.

Mr. ROGERS. I understood the point of order was whether the House or the Committee of the Whole had authority to consider this bill at all with this language in it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that that was the proposition.

Mr. ROGERS. If the point of order is simply to certain language in the bill I have no objection to its being sustained, but I think it is important that the authority of the House to consider a bill should not be diminished or defeated simply because there is somewhere in it a provision that the committee did not have the authority to report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill contains two different things. It is specifically provided in this appropriation act that the appropriation shall be available beyond the fiscal year by the language "available until expended." The Agricultural appropriation act, as to this item referred to in this resolution, only makes the appropriation available for the current fiscal year. It seems to me that it may be a somewhat close question, whether the legislative committee has the authority to provide for the use of an appropriation already made by legislation for purposes other than those now in an appropriation act. But making an appropriation available beyond the fiscal year is making a new appropriation, and is clearly contrary to the rule of the House. Whether under the rule the question can be raised at any time I believe the precedent is that it can be raised in the House before the bill is taken up in committee, and it can be raised, I assume, on the reading of the bill in committee, the Speaker having properly decided some time ago that it did not go to the reporting of the bill because otherwise the House could not take any action at all on a Senate bill carrying an appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, this appropriation has been made and the money is available. All that is sought to do in this bill is to direct when and how the money shall be expended. That is clearly legislation. If this committee has not the power to legislate, certainly the Committee on Appropriations has not the power, and the House has got itself into a condition where it must refer legislation to the Senate. I am not responsible for the rule, but we must have an interpretation, and to interpret it as contended for would be to refer legislation to the Senate. This is clearly legislation. The Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction. Are we going to surrender our rights to the Senate? Have we no rights under our rules in the House? Some committee in the House should have jurisdiction over legislation. This is clearly legislation, hence the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction. If so, the House is helpless and dependent upon the Senate, as it was in the passing of appropriation bills.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike out of the bill the words "available until expended."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to strike out of the bill the words "available until expended." Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. I object. I think we should have a ruling, so that we may know where we stand.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If the specific words referred to are stricken out how does it go back to the Senate as a House amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. It goes back as every other bill goes back.

Mr. MANN. I did not ask the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair recalls, it would be messaged over from the House that the House had amended the bill by striking out those words.

Mr. MANN. And that would throw the amendment into conference. I will not pursue the parliamentary inquiry any longer, but, query, the conferees would then agree to it without a vote in the House.

Mr. GARNER. If the Chair holds that this point of order is well taken, is there any committee in the House with authority to report the bill under the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule. The Appropriations Committee appropriated the sum of $554,840 for the eradication of the pink bollworm. That appropriation expires on the 1st of July next. The Agricultural Committee comes in with an amendment which would make a part of that appropriation available during the following year and until expended. In other words, it appropriates a certain portion of the $550,000 for succeeding years. The Agricultural Committee has no jurisdiction over appropriations, and it seems to the Chair that this clearly is an appropriation. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the bill with the three words stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The ruling of the Chair on the point of order strikes out the three words.

Under the rule, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 72, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution. The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm.

Resolved, etc. That when any State shall have enacted legislation and taken measures, including the establishment and enforcement of noncotton zones, adequate, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, to eradicate the pink bollworm in any area thereof actually infested, or threatened, by such pest, the said Secretary, under regulations to be prescribed by him, is authorized, out of the appropriation of $554,840 for "Eradication of pink bollworm" made by the Agricultural appropriation act of March 3, 1921, to utilize not to exceed $200,000, in reimbursing such States for expenses incurred by them in compensating any farmer for his loss due to the enforced nonproduction of cotton within said zones: Provided, That such reimbursement of any State shall be based upon the fair rental value of said land; that such reimbursement shall not exceed one-third the amount actually paid by the State to any farmer, and, in no event, shall exceed $5 per acre; and that no reimbursement shall be made in respect of any farmer who has not complied in good faith with all quarantine and control regulations prescribed by said Secretary of Agriculture and such State relative to the pink bollworm.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, as stated in the resolution, whenever a State shall have enacted legislation and taken measures, including the establishment and enforcement of noncotton zones, adequate, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, to eradicate the pink bollworm, and so forth, the Secretary may use $200,000 of the $554,840 appropriated for the current year to pay a fair rental value for the land taken over. There are, I think, 50,000 acres in the Texas district and about 22,000 acres in Louisiana and New Mexico to be included in the noncotton producing zone. The Department of Agriculture, as stated in the letter of the Secretary printed in the report, states that it is believed that this is the most effective way of eradicating the pink bollworm.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has the Government heretofore, in eradicating pests or wiping out enemies of agricultural or forest growth, ever paid for land that is not used, on a rental value?

Mr. HAUGEN. It has not paid for land, but it has paid for animals destroyed in order to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. WALSH. But I asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAUGEN. And I answered the question that it has not.

Mr. WALSH. It has not paid for any land. Has it ever paid for any forest growth where it has had to be cut down to remove the cause of the attack of some disease or insect?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not of my knowledge. It has been prohibited by act of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. In all cases where payment has been made, the only cases have been where animals have been killed.

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly, so far as I know.

Mr. WALSH. In this case, how is it to be determined that there is an actual, definite loss. A man might have planted so many acres of cotton and the very same year he planted them there might be a drought, and cotton in other acres might not have yielded any crop at all. How are they going to ascertain what the actual, definite loss is?

Mr. HAUGEN. Of course, it would be for the State and the department to determine what the loss is.

Mr. WALSH. Then, if I understand the gentleman, this sum made available here is just a starter on this program?

Mr. HAUGEN. Just a starter, but to eradicate these pests. The policy and purpose of the department is to eradicate and not to be dilly-dallying along.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield, in order that I may answer the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASWELL. In respect to the question of payment to farmers, there is a commission appointed by the State, and that commission fixes the rental value and the loss. That commission which is appointed by authority of the legislature, in cooperation with the Federal Government, and in response to the regulations of the Federal authorities, fixes the sum.

Mr. WALSH. This money would only be paid in those States where there has been some legislative action?

Mr. ASWELL. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask somebody a question? If a farmer gets his fair rental value because he does plant cotton, may he then plant corn and have the benefit of his corn crop?

Mr. ASWELL. In some sections corn does not grow.

Mr. MANN. But there is no section where something does not grow.

Mr. ASWELL. Oh, yes, there is. There is one section in Louisiana.

Mr. MANN. Then Louisiana does not produce anything except cotton and statesmen?

Mr. ASWELL. In one section the salt water prevents the growth of corn and other things.

Mr. MANN. I take it that it does not prevent the growth of everything. That does not answer the question which I put.

Mr. ASWELL. In case the man plants other crops, this commission takes that into account and does not pay him for the full value of his loss.

Mr. MANN. But this resolution says that such reimbursement shall be paid upon a fair rental value of the land. I assume that that is fixed in advance?

Mr. ASWELL. No.

Mr. MANN. When is it fixed?

Mr. ASWELL. It is fixed by this commission during the progress of the year's development.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is fixed in advance, as far as it can be. Is a man permitted then to use the land?

Mr. ASWELL. He is, but that is to be deducted from the rent.

Mr. MANN. That would not be the fair rental value of the land.

Mr. ASWELL. If he deducts what he makes in addition, it would be.

Mr. MANN. It would not be deducting the fair rental value of the land. The gentleman may have in mind one thing and I may have in mind another.

Mr. ASWELL. That is the intention of the resolution and there would be no objection to an amendment covering that point.

Mr. HAUGEN. The department says rent, less the value for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. But that is not what the resolution says.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is what the regulations of the department say. Of course, it is for the State and the department to determine.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that is the trouble all of the time. Gentlemen in the department say one thing and then use language which means another thing.

Mr. ASWELL. I think it would be entirely satisfactory if the gentleman would offer an amendment of that kind.

Mr. MANN. But I have not any amendment in mind. I have not sufficient information, and I hoped that somebody who is interested would have.

Mr. JACOWAY. In no event shall the fair rental value of the land exceed $5.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; $15.

Mr. JACOWAY. I mean in so far as the payment by the Government is concerned.

Mr. MANN. Fifteen dollars is a pretty fair rental value for land.

Mr. JACOWAY. For some land it is.

Mr. MANN. Ought not this to be fixed so that it shall not exceed a fair rental value, and not say that it shall be based on a fair rental value?

Certainly the desire is not to urge gentlemen not to plant cotton and not to plant anything else. There may be a reason for providing that they shall not plant cotton, but they ought to be encouraged to plant something else if they can not plant the cotton.

Mr. ASWELL. They are encouraged to plant, and the amount paid is reduced by the value of what they plant.

Mr. MANN. Not under the language of this bill.

Mr. ASWELL. The department and the State legislatures cooperate in doing that.

Mr. JACOWAY. Trying to answer the question further, if I may, as I understand the resolution the farmer can plant anything he wants to, providing he does not plant something that will harbor this bollworm, and I imagine, at the end of the time or if the rental is fixed before that time, he will take into consideration the acreage of crops he raises other than cotton.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's imagination may be correct, but would it not be just as well to state it in the law and not leave it to a question of imagination?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. In answering the question, the general way would be for the Government to rent the land and pay the rental value, say, for instance, pay $5 and rent for three. The difference between the five and three would be $2; that would be the orderly way of doing business.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman from Iowa suggested we were now undertaking to embark upon a new policy?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, in effect it is that.

Mr. HAUGEN. We embarked upon that policy a number of years ago in the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease and also tuberculosis.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. To compensate farmers for the loss of their crops?

Mr. HAUGEN. For the loss of animals. We paid the difference between the value of the animal and the salvage, exactly as we are to do in this instance.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let us see. Stated in plain terms in the English language this thing means that hereafter the Federal Government is going to insure the farmers now against the loss of a certain standardized crop if it is caused by disease—

Mr. HAUGEN. It means this, that the Government is going to do its best in eradicating this disease.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to state the thing in the language it bears and not in the language of the gentleman's presentation.

Mr. HAUGEN. The thing is to reimburse the farmer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Ah, exactly. The eradication of the disease may be the main objective, but the effect is that the Federal Government will insure every farmer who is put out of a crop by reason of there being some pest or disease on his land—

Mr. HAUGEN. If he complies with the rules and regulations.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is what it comes to. That is one way of eradicating the disease, to insure the farmer. Now, how much longer will it be before we insure other people for losses made in their business because of a similar misfortune?

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman contend we can take property without due process of law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This is what I contend: I may be using my acres to breed a pest that may go over on my neighbor's acres and destroy his crop.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, so far as his acres may be concerned—

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Can we breed a pest on our acres and, more than that, be paid for making ourselves a nuisance?

Mr. HAUGEN. How are you going to eradicate it?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You are getting to a philosophy here that some day will turn around and meet this Congress coming back, and we will not have money enough to meet it, and we will have to sacrifice every principle upon which the Government was founded.

Mr. HAUGEN. We seem to have plenty of money for everything except to pay the farmer.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I was probably the only Republican Member who attended the meeting called by the Secretary of Agriculture to consider the dangers from this pink bollworm to the South, and I am one of those people who believe that whatever affects one person, one State, one Commonwealth, will affect all, whether it be the cotton spinner in Massachusetts or the cotton grower in Texas or Louisiana. I went to that conference, I listened, and I know that this concerns you more perhaps than you think because of past conditions. Texas, in the first place, did not take hold of the first boll-weevil invasion that came across the border from Mexico. Oklahoma came into the Union as a Democratic State because the boll weevil drove cotton raisers before its ravages from Texas up into our region seeking soil free from infection, and these cotton raisers made all the southern counties solidly Democratic. We have enough Democratic voters now, and possibly with one Republican Member here already Texas will have need of them. We have had too much cotton lately. Our cotton people are earnest, hard-working, and industrious people, but are starving now, almost. But this pink bollworm is a new pest. It may be stopped. Future crises may again demand cotton, as in the war so lately past. We dare not risk making the supply impossible. Massachusetts had the gypsy moth and California had the San Jose scale, and a billion dollars would not pay for the annual damage that has been done since, which prompt action might have prevented. This is not one crop, but two or three or four crops, because the land has got to be taken under Government supervision, and the extermination has got to go below the surface to kill the pests. In the South we do not have the frosts to kill insects as you do in the North. I believe in economy of the most rigid sort, but I think it is nothing but common, decent justice to do this. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I was struck with what the chairman said as to the foot-and-mouth disease. In my part of the country we were in the heart of that trouble. This is what happened: Many farmers by strict quarantine regulations were prevented from thrashing their grain, and men who did not have the foot-and-mouth disease on their farms were prevented from selling their stock. The consequence was that thousands of acres of land in our country on which crops were raised were largely unproductive. As a result of the unfortunate condition that arose from the desire of the country to stamp out that pest, which threatened the live-stock industry of the country, many farmers through our section were made to lose great sums of money for which they were not recompensed. The question in my mind is, How far should the Government go in this thing as regards paying these losses which were merely incidental to the general quarantine regulations which were put in force down there? It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, if we are to pay any damage at all, it ought to be restricted simply to the amount we lose; not what some State has arbitrarily fixed, but what the farmer himself actually lost.

Mr. HAUGEN. Not one dollar can be paid out unless the State passes a law limiting the amount. The present rental value in the irrigated districts is from $20 to $60 an acre, and the maximum amount to be paid by the Government is $5. The rest is to be paid by the State. The question is, Are you going to give this pink bollworm the right of way to destroy from 20 to 50 per cent of the cotton crop, or are you going to use in an effective way this money already appropriated to stamp out the pest?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am not in favor of letting it pursue its ravages. I am in favor of stopping it like we stopped the foot-and-mouth disease, but there are certain incidental damages that ought not to be permitted to come in.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Department of Agriculture has been experimenting with it for years, and it has got beyond its control, and the only way it can handle it is to do it in this way. Are you going to try it?

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield to me? If the gentleman will permit, I will read section 314 of our State law creating our commission dealing with this problem.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that the gentleman take time later on. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know who controls the time in opposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY] controls it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; he is in favor of it. We had a case yesterday where both sides were in favor of a bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WALSH. Under the Calendar Wednesday rule the time is divided between those in favor and those against.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize any member of the committee in opposition to the legislation.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I understood that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] yielded to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any member of the Committee on Agriculture present who is opposed to the bill? If not, is there any other gentleman present who demands recognition in opposition to the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts, in opposition, for one hour.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose to take up time on this measure, but there is so clearly a misunderstanding among certain Members of the House concerning it that I feel constrained to explain it the way I understand it.

We have appropriated so much money in an effort to rid the cotton belt of this pest. The Department of Agriculture has decided that it would be proper to cooperate with certain States in fixing what they call a noncotton zone, in which to prevent the raising of cotton at all for the coming season. They have advised the use of the $200,000 of this money that has been appropriated for this purpose by matching it against $400,000 that these States are willing to expend in that way.

Now, there are some things that are definite and certain. The money we have appropriated to exterminate the bollworm will be spent; it will not go back into the Treasury, because this evil is recognized in that section, and they are going to spend the money in that effort. Personally, I am convinced that the departments in those States that are spending twice as much money as they are asking the Government to spend are right, and that this is the best way to get rid of the evil. My memory goes back to the time when this Government did violate all precedents and pay to the owners of live stock one-third the value of the animals destroyed in an effort to wipe out the foot-and-mouth disease. That was advised by the department and the best veterinarians of the Nation, and we did succeed once in exterminating the disease among the live stock, and it was done along this line. I can not conceive of a conspiracy among the farmers of the cotton belt to not plant their land and then have a commission of that State appraise the rental value of it for the purpose of getting one-third of that money out of the Treasury.

I believe with the Secretary of Agriculture that they have decided that the best way to exterminate this pink bollworm is not to plant certain tracts with cotton. I do not know that the Federal Government could go down there and tell a man not to plant his land, but by cooperation with the State they have decided that certain zones shall not be cotton-producing zones for this season. This is not embarking on any new undertaking. The money will never go back to the Federal Treasury. It will be spent in attempts to exterminate the pink bollworm, and the States, by the action of their legislatures, and the Government, through the Department of Agriculture, advise using it in this way. By reason of the wording of the law, if it is not used in this way it says you can take the $200,000 and use it that way. I can not see, for the life of me, why anyone should be so worried and excited about it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCER. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Supposing a farmer planted that particular tract in cotton and the pink bollworm destroyed it. Would the State deprive him of anything when he has not planted anything?

Mr. TINCER. No. That is not the idea at all. They have said that a certain zone shall be noncotton producing. There is no evidence that the bollworm will destroy that at all.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Where is that to be located? Near the tract that the pink bollworm has worked over?

Mr. TINCER. It is in the discretion of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I know they tramp straight on and on.

Mr. TINCER. They have taken a whole zone that the farmer could not use this year. They have $200,000. They are going to spend it. It would take twice as much to free the land of the bollworm infection where it has already infected the land. I think we are splitting hairs now if we say that by reason of a certain principle—that we have never paid rent on land—you shall say to the Department of Agriculture, "Spend the money outright, but you can not spend any of it by paying money to the farmer who uses the land, because we are going to spend the money for the extermination of the bollworm generally."

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlemen yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] use some of his time?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not obtain my time under false pretenses; I do not know that I am opposed to the bill. I would favor rather radical and drastic legislation which I thought would eradicate the pink boll weevil, which I regard as a very great danger. I have read the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture, who prepared this resolution. So far as I know, the letter is the only information upon the subject available. The letter is not very informing. I would like to make an inquiry or two in reference to what is proposed here.

A man plants a field of cotton. Clearly if it is not invaded by the pink boll weevil there is no reason for destroying the cotton and paying him rent for the land. Suppose it is invaded by the pink boll weevil. Why, then, should he be paid the rental value of his land? The cotton is no good. Is it proposed to pay—

Mr. LAZARO. I can answer the gentleman's question if he will give me an opportunity—

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen can get all the time they want—

Mr. LAZARO. Because I am in one of those zones.

Mr. MANN. I prefer to let gentlemen answer in their own time.

Mr. LAZARO. I thought the gentleman was making an inquiry.

Mr. MANN. I was. I doubt if the gentleman knows. If he does, I hope he will get all the time he desires. I am not through with my inquiry. I am trying to be respectful without having my time wasted by gentlemen who usually waste the time that is yielded to them.

Suppose a man does not plant cotton at all. Is he to be paid the rental value of his land? Is it the purpose of this bill to have the State board declare that a certain county shall be a noncotton county and that nobody shall plant cotton in that county, or in several counties, or in large districts, and nobody plants cotton there, and then pay the fair rental value of the land in order to let it lie fallow? Is that the purpose of the bill? That is what the reading of the bill indicates.

Now, these gentlemen who know may be able to tell us, but certainly the Secretary of Agriculture in his letter has not told us how this is to be worked out. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCER] said this is only $200,000 that will be spent, anyhow. Two hundred thousand dollars is a mere bagatelle, so far as the killing out of the pink boll weevil is concerned. Two million dollars would be a very small sum. But if you are to pay the rental value of great areas of land, $2,000,000 will not go very far, much less $200,000 in one year, much less in a series of years; and I hope the gentlemen who have gone into this matter thoroughly, if anybody has—and I doubt it—will tell us what the procedure is to be and how we are to ascertain what our liability is.

A man has a cotton field infected with the pink boll weevil, and if you can take that cotton field and destroy the cotton and end the boll weevil I think he would be glad to pay for it. But that is not what the bill provides or contemplates, so far as I can see. Well, his cotton, if infected, is not worth much; certainly not worth the fair rental value of the land. So far as I can read the bill, in its terms it proposes to hire men and not to cultivate the soil.

Now, if that sort of thing prevails, where is it to end? I get a notice every year in my little garden—and I apologize for not being there—from the State entomological inspector, telling me to destroy a certain thing because it has some kind of scale on it, and that I must not raise certain things. So far as I know, neither he nor the State of Illinois nor the Government of the United States has ever suggested that I be recompensed for the rent of the land or for the things which are destroyed.

Where are we going to end? Where will we go with this bill? This is a general authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to do what he pleases. If it were only $200,000 involved, we might be glad to spend the money. I may vote for the bill. But I think a matter of this sort ought to be carefully considered and the lines laid down so that we may know what we are doing before we start precedents which will lead us to pay for land lying fallow for a thousand and one purposes. If you could destroy all the crops in the United States and raise nothing new for 10 years, you would probably end the corn borer. But who has proposed that if the corn borer gets out in my State the farmers shall be paid the rental value of their land for not raising corn or not raising anything else? [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, if I recall correctly, it was not many months ago that a certain distinguished Member of this House, a man who was called a Member of the House at the time, rambled through the Southland, making eloquent speeches to the cotton farmers, pleading with them not to plant their cotton fields, in order that they might curtail the crop and thus raise the price. I do not know how many of them took his advice, but I do know that there is a lot of cotton there and no demand for it in the market, and that the price is low.

Now it is proposed, not only when the price is low but when the farmer has no incentive to increase the cotton acreage, to permit the Department of Agriculture, in cooperation with the respective agricultural departments of the States in the cotton belt, to go to the farmers and say, "So many acres of your plantations shall not be planted with cotton, and we will pay you a portion of the fair rental value."

The gentleman from Iowa states that this is not a precedent, but I submit that it is distinctly a new precedent in this particular line of activity on the part of the Department of Agriculture. Now, some of the States have found it necessary to inhibit the planting of corn in various counties because the corn borer has been ravaging the corn crop and has been gradually spreading, but there has been no proposal in any State that I have ever heard of that because you can not plant corn we will pay you a proportion of the fair rental value of the land. Now, the State and the district from which I come have more than the ordinary interest in the cotton crop of this country. There are some 30 or 40 cotton mills in the district which I have the honor to represent, with millions of spindles, dependent for the most part on the cotton crop of the South. They are interested in seeing that any pest or disease is kept within control, but I do not believe that the people of the Nation, if they understood the proposition here, would be willing to embark upon this particular kind of a policy, because this is but the start, and while the sum here is insignificant, once you establish the policy, there will be demands from people who fear they are going to be threatened with this pest that will roll up the expenses in an enormous sum. Now, in eradicating the hoof-and-mouth disease the Department of Agriculture destroyed the animals and paid for them. In eradicating hog cholera, I think, they kill the animals and pay for them, but there is nothing speculative in that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How would the gentleman interpret this phraseology?—

To compensate any farmer for his loss due to the enforced nonproduction of cotton within said zone.

How is that to be determined?

Mr. WALSH. I was just about to say that in the case of hog cholera and the hoof-and-mouth disease there was nothing speculative, because the Government only paid for animals destroyed, but this seems to open up a wide field for speculation. Now, it may be that the States have laid down certain policies and regulations under which this can be ascertained, but I will venture to say that if the States have reduced it to an exact science, when some of these experts from the Department of Agriculture arrive on the scene they will upset the scheme entirely and put in something that no sane man had ever dreamed of before.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In paying these losses for the foot-and-mouth disease I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that nothing was paid except for property actually destroyed.

Mr. WALSH. That is the point I made. They paid the value of the animal that was destroyed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not conceive of anything more highly speculative than to determine what a farmer might lose through the nonproduction of cotton. It depends entirely on the price on the day he sold it.

Mr. WALSH. Absolutely.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And there is no price here to determine that.

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. HAUGEN. We took over the railroads and we compensated them. We are now taking over these farms, and we propose in this resolution to compensate the farmers.

Mr. WALSH. Bad as the railroad administration was, we got a little service for what we took over, and we made a contract with them when we took the railroads over; but none of these men have any contracts with the Federal Government or anybody else as to what they shall do with their cotton crop.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will read the language of the joint resolution he will find that a contract is to be made.

Mr. WALSH. The contract is to pay these farmers for not planting cotton and to pay the fair rental value.

Mr. HAUGEN. Congress did not make the contract with the railroads.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, as pointed out by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] it is proposed to reimburse the States for expenses incurred by them in compensating the farmer for his loss due to the enforced nonproduction of cotton within the zones fixed in the States. That is the contract to which the agriculturalist from Iowa refers. You are holding out encouragement for nonproduction. Now, it may be true that the bollworm is on the rampage in that particular locality and that a strip of land many acres in area and width and many rods or miles in length is put within the restricted zone and that no cotton grows there. Just beyond that zone cotton is grown and the bollworm gets in there and destroys the crop.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I simply want to ask a question. The language about which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asked a question means this, does it not, that the Government is not to pay the farmer, but it is to reimburse the States in part for moneys which they have already paid to the farmer, expenses incurred by the States in compensating the farmer for his losses. The State has already determined the loss and paid the farmer and incurred the expenses, and this is in part to reimburse the States. There is nothing speculative in so far as this particular language is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman ought to read the proviso. He stopped with the colon and did not read the proviso. If he had read it he would then see how the speculation is involved.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. We will see whether I am correct or not. This is to reimburse the States for expenses incurred by them. A State incurs expenses before it will be reimbursed. We do not reimburse any State except where it has compensated the farmer, based on the fair rental value.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is wrong, because the reimbursement is based upon the conditions laid down in the proviso. The State does not fix the conditions of reimbursement. They are fixed according to the terms of this act, that the reimbursement shall be based upon the fair rental value of the land, that it shall not exceed one-third the amount paid by the State and shall not exceed $5 per acre, and shall not be made in respect of any farmer who has not complied in good faith.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I recall very recently, within a few years, that the Department of Agriculture, in an effort to wipe out the wheat rust, went into the estates and grounds and gardens and ripped up the barberry bushes, some varieties of which were very costly, that had been planted at a great expense as ornamental shrubs, but I have not heard of anybody suggesting that they should be compensated or that there should be paid by the Federal Government any fair rental value of the gardens or estates that were destroyed. I believe that if the cotton farmer in the various areas suffers a loss there may be some way provided by cooperation between the States whereby the actual loss suffered as a result of this pest might be compensated for, but you say to John Doe in the State of Mississippi, "You may not plant your plantation with cotton this year, but you can plant it to anything else; we want to stop the boll weevil, and then we will pay you a fair rental for the value of your land," and under this act the crop raised would not affect the fair rental value. They say to him, "We will pay you for not raising cotton, but you can raise some other crop." I say, Mr. Speaker, we ought to hesitate before establishing this precedent. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 14 minutes; 22 altogether.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] 10 minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this resolution on principle. I believe it is a vicious proposition; that whenever the Government appropriates money, goes out and tries to relieve the people of a pest which affects them, the Government must follow it up and pay every conceivable loss or damage which may result. The gentleman from Massachusetts talks about a matter of speculation that enters into it. That would be a difficulty in the operation of the law. As I say, I oppose it on principle. I believe that it is a dangerous precedent for this Government to establish. It is an outrageous proposition that when the Government is called upon to do work for the relief of people that it must follow it up and pay them for accepting the relief which the Government would give.

It has been tried before. Only a few years ago there was a scourge of the citrus canker in the South, and the Government appropriated a lot of money for it. Some of us learned that the agents of the Government, as they are carrying on the work now under consideration, proposed to destroy some of the orange groves of the South and pay for them. At my instance an amendment was put in the bill which refused the use of the money to pay the loss of any property that was found necessary to be destroyed in order to regulate, control, or eradicate the scourge.

For an illustration, the Government establishes a hospital to fix up a man or perform an operation on him to save his life. It takes him there, performs the operation, and some of the committee think we must pay him for his time, for the privilege we exercise of saving his life, reimbursing him for all the loss he imagines he has sustained by reason of the beneficent act performed.

The foot-and-mouth disease has been alluded to. That was a case where the Government went out and gave the people no choice. They took the animals, used the strong arm of the law, and destroyed them. Whether the owner was willing or not, the animals were destroyed, and it was felt incumbent on the Government, partially, at least, to reimburse owners.

The Government later embarked on a policy, wise or not, to eradicate tuberculosis, for which the Government undertakes to pay a portion of the value of animals destroyed, but it is optional with the owner of the animal whether he shall permit the destruction or whether he shall permit the State or the Federal authorities to have anything to do with his animals.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is that quite so, that the owner has an option in the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I said it was optional with the owner in the matter of tuberculosis. In the foot-and-mouth disease the Government used its strong arm and the owner had no option in the matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it optional with the farmer to plant cotton?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. As far as the United States Government is concerned, yes, but some of the cotton States have laws by which they can compel farmers to refrain from using their lands, and when one of these States functions under that law the owners are not permitted to use their land for cotton. Now, this resolution would compel the Federal Government to reimburse the State for money it pays such owners.

The Department of Agriculture is carrying on all kinds of activities, making all kinds of investigations, analyses, experiments, and demonstrations. I have been on the Committee on Agriculture a good many years and am quite familiar with the work of that department. I have always favored in every way possible the work of the Government in making investigation. Let its officers and employers carry on all kinds of experiments, let them make all kinds of demonstrations, but when they have determined and reached a result and found a remedy for existing troubles, and nothing remains but to apply it with the use of the money, and the use of labor, then it is up to the people themselves largely to put forth that effort and to use their own money. [Applause.]

We often find that when the Government works out a proposition and discovers a remedy for a more or less serious evil existing, the Government makes its demonstrations, the people like it and they wish the Government to shoulder the entire burden, take up and carry on the work with its own agents, its own money, a policy which I believe is altogether wrong. I have opposed every such proposition to the limit of my ability as long as I have been on the committee, just as strongly as I insist that there should be money and legislation provided for extensive and all kinds of experiments and discoveries and analyses wherever there is need or promise of removing trouble or of improving conditions.

But the idea that the Federal Government must go out into the country and carry all these things out, do all the work, pay all the expense, bear all the burden, when it is simply a question of ordinary work and the laying out of money, I think is all wrong, and the Government should not be asked to do it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I oppose this as a matter of principle. If we establish this principle to-day, we open wide the door. There is no limit to it. We will be called upon to go out and do for the people, care for them, nurse them, assist them, advise them, and for any burden imposed upon them we shall have to recompense them. It is wrong in principle. If we have violated that principle heretofore, for God's sake do not carry it any further. Better retrace our steps and get on the right road than to keep our faces in the wrong direction and keep on going at the pace this vicious legislation would take us. [Applause.]

I trust the membership of this House will defeat this resolution.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the Congress appropriated for this fiscal year $554,840 for the eradication of the pink bollworm. I fail to see how anyone who favors the original appropriation can oppose this resolution. This $554,840 appropriated by Congress was for the purpose of eradicating this pest which scientific men say will, if allowed to remain in this country, destroy from 25 to 50 per cent of our production. That being the purpose of the appropriation, this resolution simply provides that $200,000 of the appropriation may be expended in a manner not originally authorized, to wit, for the reimbursement of certain States which by legislation have created non-cotton-producing sections and incurred expense by payment of loss to owners of such land. The Secretary of Agriculture says that after going into this matter thoroughly with the scientific men, understanding this proposition and this great problem, they have come to the conclusion that the most economical and effective way of fighting this pest is by creating these noncotton-growing districts. This being true, what is wrong with this resolution? Why should we care how the money is spent, so long as it is spent effectively and for the purpose for which it was appropriated?

The question here to-day that Members on the Republican side of the House coming from the great agricultural sections of the West and the Northwest must determine is whether they will follow the advice and the leadership of Secretary Wallace, who is a farmer, a broad-minded, thinking, progressive farmer, or follow the leadership of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who for six long years has spoken and voted against every proposition for the benefit of the farmer, North or South, which has been brought onto this floor. That is the question we have to decide. In the discussion of the tariff bill we saw this sentiment and feeling cropping out in certain gentlemen to vote against everything that affected the farmer, everything that was in the farmer's interest. I say to you that it is essentially important to every section of this great country, North and South, that our capacity to produce cotton be not impaired, and this pest of the pink bollworm, an insect which has invaded this country from Mexico, is one of the most serious things that cotton growers and the people interested in the production of cotton in this country now have to confront. The Secretary of Agriculture says that the expenditure of this $200,000 in this way will probably lessen the ultimate cost in fighting and eradicating this pest.

It is said that it is uncertain and speculative. Not so. The resolution provides that where certain States by legislation have created noncotton-producing areas, where the owners of the land shall be reimbursed, the Federal Government may, to the amount of one-third, contribute to the expense of the money paid out by those States. What is wrong with that? It is simply fighting this pest in a way that the Secretary of Agriculture and the scientific men in the Department of Agriculture say is most feasible and expedient. To stand here and quibble and talk about embarking on new propositions and new ventures is entirely beside the question. Do we favor the original proposition for the expenditure of this $500,000 for this purpose? It is assumed that the Congress did, because it was passed by a unanimous vote. Then why quibble as to how $200,000 of it shall be expended if, in the view of those who know, who have investigated the matter, and to whom we must naturally look for advice on this proposition, it is for the best interests of the country and will go further than anything else to eradicate the pest?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY].

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman, the pending resolution is a most important one, especially to the South, but for that matter, to the entire Nation, because in every sense it can be classed as a national question. Ultimately, if the ravages of this worm are not checked, its work of devastation will seriously cripple the chief industry in 812 cotton-growing counties of the South, and directly and vitally affect 30,000,000 of people. This being so, the consideration to be given the matter should receive the most earnest and honest consideration on both sides of the aisle. I have given the provisions of the pending resolution the greatest of care and studied investigation. I do not believe there is a man who sits on the Republican side of the Chamber who, when he correctly understands what the resolution will accomplish, will withhold his vote in support of it but be vigorous in its support.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOWAY. Not now. As suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], who has just preceded me, in matters of this character, upon what authority do we rely and whose conclusions should throw light and be convincing? I would answer this by saying that the present Secretary of Agriculture, in whom I have great confidence, both on account of his heart and brain qualities, has written a letter, after the most far-reaching investigation, to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, which letter, in my judgment, answers every argument which has been made on the other side of the Chamber in opposition to this resolution, and in my judgment it should unerringly and beyond doubt convince every Member on that side of the Chamber and cause him to support this resolution. Notwithstanding my time is limited, I am going to read the Secretary's letter, because of its convincing nature, and besides, it is couched in a most dignified diction and presents an argument upon which I can not improve in the time at my disposal. The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN,
Washington, June 3, 1921.
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.
DEAR MR. HAUGEN: Some days ago I transmitted to Senator WARREN the draft of proposed legislation, for inclusion in the deficiency appropriation bill, authorizing this department to participate in the expense of maintaining noncotton zones in States where infestation by the pink bollworm of cotton has been found. Unfortunately, my letter did not reach Senator WARREN until after the deficiency bill had been reported to the Senate. A revised draft of the item is inclosed herewith.

This legislation proposes the use of not to exceed $200,000 of the appropriation of $554,840 for pink bollworm eradication made available by the Agricultural appropriation act of March 3, 1921, for the purpose of reimbursing States for a portion of the expenses incurred by them in compensating farmers for losses due to the enforced non-production of cotton within the prescribed zones. On account of its great importance to the cotton industry of the country I am taking the liberty to suggest the advisability of dealing with the matter through special legislation which will involve no additional appropriation.

We have come to the critical period in our fight against the pink bollworm. This is a more dangerous pest to the cotton plant than any of which we have knowledge. It first made its appearance in the United States in 1917, coming in from Mexico. Mexico got it from Egypt and Egypt from India. Careful investigations indicate that if once it spreads through our cotton belt it will destroy from 20 to 50 per cent of the crop and possibly more at times.

The department agents detected its presence in this country promptly and set about measures of holding it in check or eradicating it. It has been held in check fairly well up to the present time, but all of our people are now convinced that safety lies in following the most approved methods of eradication. These methods require the establishment of zones in which no cotton shall be grown for a period of three years, and, of course, must have the full cooperation of the States. When we establish a noncotton zone, which means that we forbid the growing of cotton in that zone for the period fixed, we work a hardship upon some of the farmers in that zone who find cotton a much more profitable crop than any other they can grow. For this reason it is necessary and just that farmers who suffer in this way shall be partially reimbursed on the same theory that we partially reimburse farmers whose live stock is killed in the process of stamping out a contagious disease.

This whole matter was brought to my attention shortly after I became the head of this department. I called a conference of representatives from the various cotton States. They met here a couple of weeks since and went over the whole matter with the scientific men in our department. The various State representatives indicated an earnest desire to cooperate in every way possible in an effort to eradicate this pest and promised to do everything in their power to secure in their respective States whatever legislation may be considered necessary. Some of them felt, however, that in view of the national menace it would be only fair that the Federal Government should participate to some extent with the States in partially reimbursing those cotton farmers who may suffer loss because of the measures necessarily adopted. This seems to me to be a reasonable view.

It is the opinion of our scientists, who are very familiar with this whole matter, that the use of some of this money for reimbursement purposes will result in saving money in the fight against this pest, for much of the area involved in the proposed reimbursement will not be a continuing charge. Either the pest will be eliminated in two or three years or the effort will have failed. It now costs approximately $10 per acre to clean infested cotton land of old cotton. In noncotton zones, which our present plan would permit us to establish, this cost would be eliminated, and we believe that the reimbursement proposed would be less than the clean-up cost.

The request I am now making comes after very full investigation of the whole matter, both by the scientists of this department and by the scientists and authorities in the States involved.

Very sincerely,

HENRY C. WALLACE, Secretary.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOWAY. Not now. In my opinion, that letter covers this case, and from my viewpoint is unanswerable. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] say that this is a dangerous precedent upon which the American Congress is embarking. In the conclusions they reach I take serious issue with them. I am glad to occupy the opposite of this issue. The legislative history of the American Congress writes a positive traverse on the conclusions they reach. If you will recall, the Congress has passed numerous agricultural bills through this House, and which have become laws, and which have carried appropriations for many millions of dollars for the eradication of tuberculosis in cattle. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture I took pleasure in voting for these items, because they assisted in building up the beef industry of the country, and in addition to that were great health-improvement measures. The question of eradicating tuberculosis in cattle became so alarming and the task so huge that Federal aid was asked, and Congress was quick to respond to the call. I read from the following table showing the date of the appropriation, amount appropriated, operating expenses, as also indemnities, as also a table of totals:

<sup>1</sup> The cost of burial and value of property destroyed was shared equally between the United States and the State involved.

In no sense of the word am I taking the position that these amounts should not have been appropriated, but, to the contrary, I take the position that they were most just, that it was the duty of the Federal Government to lend its aid in stamping out this disease, which had become too big for the States to deal with separately or collectively, and that instead of it being an expenditure of money that was wasted, it was a great investment, and the beneficent results that have flowed from these investments are too obvious to need comment from me. I am also quite sure that the committee is entirely familiar with the appropriation that has been made from time to time for the eradication of what is known as the white-pine blister rust. In the brief that I submit is shown the Federal appropriation, Federal expenditures, and State expenditures, as follows:

The Federal funds for white pine blister rust were expended for the following lines of work:

1. Local control of the disease by the eradication of ribes in cooperation with the Northeastern and Lake States ($1 for $1 cooperation)..... $553,754.38
2. Experimental control work to develop control methods and reduce the cost of protecting pine stands, educational demonstration of control methods..... 92,292.40
3. Protecting the public and private 5-needle pine interests of the West, including scouting for the disease, inspection of nursery stock in transit to prevent the movement of host plants of blister rust from quarantine areas into uninfected regions, tracing and having destroyed under State authority all shipments of host plants made in violation of the Federal blister rust quarantine, gathering data on the destruction of blister rust host plants, educational, etc..... 276,877.18

I desire to further call the attention of the committee to the fact that when the citrus-fruit industry of the United States was in danger of being badly crippled, if not entirely exterminated, it was the part of wisdom on the part of the Federal Government to lend its aid and to reach out its strong arm and assist in preventing a great economic loss, which it willingly and generously did, thus saving the citrus-fruit industry of the United States, and instead of seeing the day when it would have been exterminated and a lost industry in which many millions of American capital was invested, to the contrary it saw the disease entirely stamped out. This action on the part of the Government of the United States, in my judgment, will make the United States the chief market for citrus fruits. In my judgment, no one can say that this was a useless expenditure of money, but that it was wise and well timed.

For the benefit of the committee, I wish to state that the extent of these appropriations and a summary of Federal expenditures as well as State expenditures are as follows:

Citrus canker eradication.

The committee will see at a glance that all of these appropriations to which I refer have been made for the purpose of eradicating some disease that afflicts either the animal life of the country, its forest resources, or horticultural activities, and I do it for the purpose of showing and demonstrating to the committee that the nature of this resolution is not new nor the principle involved one that is newly found, but that more than ample authority is written in the history of governmental legislation to justify the passage of the present resolution, and that in a manner the opposition is estopped from setting up these contentions.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Will the gentleman yield right there to clear up this matter?

Mr. JACOWAY. I will yield.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Does not that involve the principle of appropriating Federal money to be again appropriated by State legislatures?

Mr. JACOWAY. Yes, sir; and the State legislatures go two-thirds and the Federal Government one-third.

COTTON CONFERENCE HELD IN WASHINGTON RELATIVE TO CONTROL OF PINK BOLLWORM.

In May of this year, at the instance of the present Secretary of Agriculture, a pink bollworm conference was called to meet in Washington for the purpose of considering measures to be taken to eradicate from the United States this newly introduced cotton pest. This conference was attended by representatives from practically all of the cotton-growing States. The delegates who attended this convention included appointees by the governors and representatives of the important farm, cotton, and educational associations. A committee nominated by the State delegations formulated a report, which was universally approved by the conference, stating:

The conference recognized that the pink bollworm presents the most serious menace that has ever confronted the cotton industry of this country and believed, from the existing status of the pest and from the evidence presented, that there is a reasonable opportunity, with adequate Federal and State cooperation, of eradicating it. The conference endorsed the policy of the Department of Agriculture looking to eradication.

The conference recommended that, in view of the fact that this pest is a menace to the entire cotton industry of the country, the burden of its control should be shared by the Federal Government with the States actually infested.

The conference recommended, further, that the States concerned and other States provide legislation which will give ample authority through the agency of noncotton and regulated zones for such regional control as necessary to effect extermination.

The delegates from Texas, representing the important farm interests of that State, promised full support in securing adequate legislation and cooperation on the part of Texas.

The present appropriation of $200,000 carried in the resolution was recommended by this conference called by the Secretary of Agriculture, and I feel quite sure that it will greatly assist in ridding the cotton-growing sections of the country from a pest whose ravages are more devastating and fatal than those of the boll weevil and which, as suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture, whose letter I have just read, will in the future be the means of saving to the South anywhere from 1,600,000 to 2,700,000 bales of cotton, and measured in dollars and cents will result in an economic national saving of many hundreds of millions of dollars, from which the entire Nation will derive benefit.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. What authority have we—

Mr. JACOWAY. I can not yield further. I will say that the State of Arkansas, which I have the honor in part to represent, is awake to the dangers of the ravages of the pink bollworm, and during the sitting of its last legislature, in response to a suggestion from the Federal Government, and in anticipation of the Federal Government doing its part to meet this national issue, passed a law clothing the State officials with full power to meet any exigency that might arise and to be fully prepared should this pest invade our State. In answering further the interrogatory of my colleague [Mr. ROSENBLOOM] will say that the State of Louisiana has also passed the necessary legislation to cooperate fully and in a most whole-hearted manner with the Federal Government in meeting this agricultural problem so vital to the farmers of the South and which in its last analysis means the saving of a vast wealth that probably would be lost unless, as said by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, the crisis is immediately and effectually solved and this pest exterminated at once.

Mr. Chairman, the question of cotton is not a sectional proposition, and it would be a misnomer to call it a national proposition, for it is even broader than that. From cotton is made the cloth that clothes the world, and this matter therefore falls within the realm of those things which in their broadest sense are international. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 29 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa 23 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I come from a consuming district, but I come from a district that depends upon the farmer and stands with the farmer.

Mr. BLANTON. What do they consume?

Mr. HILL. I should not speak upon this bill unless I believed it involved a very dangerous principle. During the recent war our constitutional and governmental principles had to go temporarily by the board, but at the present time we are starting on a system of reconstruction in this country, and every precedent we make is one which may be followed to the benefit or detriment of this Government. This Government is founded on the theory of the National Government doing its own work and the States doing their own work. The original appropriation made by the Agricultural appropriation bill was based on that theory. There were $400,000 appropriated in order for the National Government to do certain specific things—to exterminate the pink bollworm. Let us see what those things were. Among other things, the Federal Government was—

To establish in cooperation with the States—

Not pay the States for doing the work of the Government, but to establish in cooperation with the States—

a zone or zones free from cotton culture on or near the border of any State or States adjacent to Mexico, and to cooperate with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities—

There was a proviso that carried $400,000 for this—

Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the cost or value of crops or other property injured or destroyed.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I decline to yield. Now, the gentleman from Illinois said that any man who opposed this measure opposed aid to cotton and opposed the Committee on Agriculture. I should have voted for the Agricultural appropriation bill, but propose to vote against this bill, because the Agricultural bill was based on the sound governmental principle of the United States doing its own work to aid the States, but this bill is based on the vicious principle of paying money to the States to do the work that this National Government should do itself. [Applause.]

I yield back whatever time may remain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, there is a vast difference between the principle involved in this bill and that which operated in the foot-and-mouth disease legislation. The latter was based upon the question of health just the same as the elimination or the attempted elimination of tuberculosis in cattle. There was in mind then the health of the child who would drink the milk, and in the foot-and-mouth disease the legislation was based on the quarantine powers of the Government to maintain the health of the people of the country. We did not put it upon the basis of mere profits, while this legislation is purely on the basis of profits and can not be urged at all as a precedent in confirmation of this legislation.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I can not yield. There is another feature that is, I think, misunderstood. My friend from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] said that we are not in favor of the farmer if we vote against this proposed legislation. It is not in the interest of the farmer. This money we propose to give does not go to the farmer. This money goes to the States. It is a reimbursement. The Congress is reimbursing such States for expenses incurred by them in compensating any farmer for his loss and to enforced nonproduction of cotton. The States have paid it, that is true, but you are not making a contribution to the individual, who has already been paid under the State authority; you are here called upon to now pay to the State when the State has paid under its own contract, its own obligation. It is a demand by the State upon the Government of the Nation to pay its own obligation under the guise of quarantine powers. It is not fair. Then there is another feature here that is worse than all—

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. It is scientifically unsound. I speak of the provision that invites idleness by paying a rental for land not used.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FESS. It is economically vicious. What is it? Why, we are told that if you want to eradicate an evil, the bollworm, you do it under the order of the State by enforced nonproduction of the article that is endangered. In this case cotton. Then why not stop raising cotton under this bill and let the Government pay for the cotton land for not raising it? What is the use to go along and make an effort to raise anything when the Government is willing to step in and say, "We will pay you"? Where is the incentive to work? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] brought out this distinctive item: The farms might be producing something else. But by this bill it is most profitable to the cotton farmer to allow his land to rest idle. The very want of a variety of industry in the cotton States is the greatest danger to the southern country that they face to-day. It has always been an economic thralldom against which the people have struggled, and against the advice of the leading men of the country, including the leading thinkers of the cotton section.

It is almost universally recognized that they have not sufficiently variegated the industries of the States. The Secretary of Agriculture—and I want the membership of the Democratic side of the House to recognize this—the Secretary of Agriculture recognized that this land might be put into some other thing than cotton, for he says in his letter:

When we establish a noncotton zone, which means that we forbid the growing of cotton in that zone for the period fixed, we work a hardship upon some of the farmers in that zone who find cotton a much more profitable crop than any other they can grow.

Oh, let the Government step in and instead of inducing the Southern farmer to plant the less profitable crop tell him to leave his ground vacant, save his time and labor, and pay him on the basis of the more profitable crop. I think that is perfectly vicious, and we ought not to tolerate it for one minute.

Mr. ASWELL. That is not a statement of the facts.

Mr. FESS. That is what the Secretary says. He says it will work a hardship, because the farm would produce less profit if planted to something else.

Mr. ASWELL. I know what the Secretary of Agriculture said.

Mr. FESS. I have just read what he said, and I do not yield further.

The truth of the matter is that there is a certain demand coming from certain sections of the country that "whether we work or not we have to be paid." And that thing must stop somewhere. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think a good deal of the opposition that has been voiced to this measure has arisen from a misunderstanding of its purpose. I have noted a number of things that have been offered in objection to the measure. Most of them would not, I believe, have been made had those who made those objections understood just how the thing will work out in detail.

As a matter of fact the National Government took the first step in this matter. The department even suggested the quarantining of the entire State of Texas and forbidding all shipment interstate. Thus Texas had little choice in the matter.

Now, as a matter of fact, the National Government has made a lot of appropriations to eliminate the foot-and-mouth disease and tuberculosis in cattle, but even those troubles arose in the country itself. This is a stronger case than either of those, for the reason that the pink bollworm is not indigenous to Texas or to southern soil or to any other American soil. It comes into this country like an invading army from another country. And, as the Secretary intimates in his letter, it is a national question for that reason. If an invading army were to come into New England or into the West or North, or into any other section of the United States, no one would stop to raise the question of its being a local matter. Now, this is an outside pest that comes in here after that form. Some curious objections have been made to the measure. One man said if the pest destroyed the crop, the property would not have any rental value, and a number of questions have been raised along that line, as though the only one that would have the non-cotton zone fastened upon him would be the one who was afflicted with the pest. The reports, and the hearings before the committee when this original appropriation was made, show that in fighting this matter it is necessary to draw a circle around where the pest is found.

There may not be more than two or three found in the original field, but it is necessary, in order to stop the pest, to make a circle around that on the man that has not the pest. You talk about taking the value of a man's property in cattle and other things. When you forbid a man to plant on land that is uninfected the very thing that that land is suited to grow, you take his property, when he has done nothing, when his own property is not infested, and when it is useful for a certain purpose. This is the taking of private property.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Government pay for the loss of cattle when destroyed for tuberculosis?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Government pays one-third of the value of the cattle and the State pays one-third, or two-thirds, whichever it may see fit to pay. But, as a matter of fact, let me make just this suggestion: The Secretary of Agriculture says—and that was shown all the way through—that this is simply a method of eradication. Everyone concedes the pest ought to be eradicated. Now, they can go in and destroy the actual crop where the pest is found; it takes $10 an acre to do that. They have found by drawing a noncotton zone around the infested field and prohibiting the growing of cotton on that ground, they can best eradicate the pest.

Now, some one has suggested that what we appropriated for the foot-and-mouth disease and for tuberculosis was a question of health. As a matter of fact, it was an agricultural matter, referred to the Agricultural Committee, and the appropriation made by the Agricultural Committee as an agricultural matter. Of course, incidentally health was affected. Incidentally health will be affected here.

Now, my friends, this is a pest that works after a worse fashion than has ever been known.

Again, let me make the suggestion that our Constitution forbids the State of Texas or any other State interfering with interstate or foreign commerce. The only way to keep the pink bollworm out of Texas is to stop importation of cotton seed from Mexico. Likewise its carriage to other States is a matter that can not be controlled by them. It can only be handled by the Federal Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, there is no Member of this House more favorable to the interests of agriculture than I. I voted for the appropriation for the suppression of the boll weevil. But I can not see that this is a proper function of the United States Government. It so happens I have had some experience in the growing of cotton and observing the ravages of the boll weevil, and I have suffered from the effects of that pest to a very considerable extent. My observation shows that it comes through the country from the southwest to the northeast and reaches a certain point each year.

Mr. PARRISH. This is the bollworm and not the weevil.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It comes from the same direction.

Mr. PARRISH. It has different habits. It comes from Egypt and then into Mexico.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. All right. The point that it reaches this year is where it is probably going to begin work next year, and if this noncotton zone were not established that is probably the area that would be attacked next year and that crop probably would be destroyed anyhow if it had not been made a noncotton area.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. So far as I can see, the cotton grower in the noncotton area has not suffered any great loss, because had he planted a crop probably it would have been destroyed. On the other hand, a cotton crop, especially this year, I am told by my friends on the other side, is not a very profitable crop; in fact, it is not profitable at all, and it is so regarded at this time. Those cotton lands in almost every instance will grow corn, or oats, or cowpeas, or some forage crop, and this land could be planted, if it were set aside as a noncotton area, in some other crop, and that would serve the same purpose; so that it seems to me it is hardly the thing for the Federal Government to go in and place a price on a crop that has never been planted and which would probably have been destroyed by the pest had it been planted.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, about three years ago the pink bollworm invaded Louisiana. It was first found in the parish of Cameron, in my district. Immediately our governor and our commissioner of agriculture called a conference. A proposition was made to the farmers to declare a nonplanting zone, and they were asked if they would cooperate and help stamp out this worm if they were paid for their losses, and they agreed. The result was that the legislature passed two acts, one creating a commission, and the other creating a fund to pay the losses.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. Not now.

This commission is composed of five members, headed by the commissioner of agriculture. The members of this commission receive no salary or emolument whatever except their traveling expenses. Our people have cooperated with their State board of agriculture and the Federal Department of Agriculture, and the result is that we have exterminated the worm so far. I have received a letter from Dr. Howard, at the head of the Bureau of Entomology, recently, in which he said that if the worms were not found this year, the people in that section would be permitted to plant cotton there next year.

There is one thing sure about this proposition, and that is if you want to get results you must be practical, and you can not appropriate money and attempt to tell the Department of Agriculture how to spend this money. As lawmakers you have got to appropriate the money necessary to do the work, and then depend on your Department of Agriculture to spend this money wisely. It was so done in our case, and that is why this worm was stamped out.

Now, gentlemen, I want you to consider the cotton industry not as a sectional industry. It is a national industry. Every man, woman, and child in the United States is vitally interested in this industry. Another thing that I want to call your attention to is that the Department of Agriculture has recently issued a crop estimate, and the estimate is this: The cotton acreage has been reduced 28 per cent and the cotton crop 8,434,000 bales. Now, my friends, I want you to pause and think. There is a crop of 5,000,000 bales less than last year, and yet you propose to say you are going to vote against setting aside a fund of $200,000 to spend in exterminating this worm when we know that unless it is exterminated now it will ruin the cotton industry in the end.

Another thing that I want to call your attention to is this: Gentlemen who come from congested centers who say they represent consumers are constantly opposing these appropriations on the ground that they will do an injustice to their consumers. My friends, if you destroy this industry, or permit the pink bollworms to destroy this industry, and our purchasing power is paralyzed, why, think of what would happen to your factories in your congested centers and what would happen to your consumers in the end. I appeal to you not to consider this matter as a sectional matter, but to consider it as a national matter. [Applause.]

Now, we have already appropriated the money to exterminate the pink bollworm. Why not leave it to the Secretary of Agriculture to say how this money shall be spent? He recommends that this bill be passed. It has passed the Senate; it has been considered by the House Committee on Agriculture, and that committee has recommended it for final passage. And I appeal to you, gentlemen, to consider this matter in a practical way and help us to save the cotton industry. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to insert these two acts of the legislature of our State for the information of the Members of the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the two acts of our State legislature dealing with this matter, for the benefit of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain acts relating to the subject under discussion. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the acts referred to:

Act No. 72.

An act (house bill 182) to protect the cotton-producing industry of Louisiana from the ravages of the Mexican pink bollworm; to create a commission for the purpose of enforcing the order of the commissioner of agriculture establishing noncotton zones and regulated zones; to appropriate $250,000 in 1920 and $250,000 in 1921, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes of this act, and to reimburse such farmers, tenants, and others as are deprived of a means of livelihood by the necessary execution of the orders of the commissioner of agriculture and the commission; and to define the powers and duties of the commission.

Whereas the cotton-producing industry of the State of Louisiana is threatened with disaster by the invasion of a new pest, the Mexican pink bollworm, whose ravages in other parts of the world are as destructive, or more so, as the ravages of the boll weevil, in the opinion of the Federal and State entomologists; and

Whereas it has been deemed essential to the protection of the cotton-producing industry of Louisiana for the commissioner of agriculture of Louisiana to exercise the power vested in him by law to declare noncotton zones and regulated zones in the infested areas and in suspected areas in Cameron, Calcasieu, and Jefferson Davis Parishes and certain other points in this State; and

Whereas the execution of these orders has and will impose a distressing hardship upon some 700 (more or less) farmers and others in the parish of Cameron, who are thereby deprived of their only means of livelihood for the protection of the cotton-producing industry of the remainder of the State: Therefore

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That there is hereby created the Pink Bollworm Commission of Louisiana, which shall be composed of the commissioner of agriculture of Louisiana, who shall be chairman; the director of extension of Louisiana, who shall be vice chairman; the dean of the Louisiana State Agricultural College; and two citizens of Louisiana identified with the cotton-producing industry, to be appointed by the governor of Louisiana, who shall serve on this commission until, in the opinion of a majority of the commission, the emergency shall have passed or they are removed by death, resignation, or by the governor for failure to perform the duties incumbent on them, in event of which vacancies the governor shall fill same by appointment. No member of the commission shall draw any salary or emolument for such service except traveling expenses and a per diem of $6 while in attendance on sessions of the commission or performing some official duty ordered by the commission, which sums shall be paid on the warrant of the chairman or, in his absence or incapacity, the vice chairman.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That there is hereby appropriated out of the pink bollworm license tax fund to carry out the purposes of this act the sum of $250,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and $250,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be paid out on the warrant of the chairman or, in the event of his absence or incapacity, the vice chairman, on the approval of a majority of the commission. In the event that a special fund is created for the purposes of this act the appropriations shall be limited to the amount raised in this special fund.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That the Pink Bollworm Commission of Louisiana shall engage such clerical and other help as may be necessary; and shall investigate conditions in said parish of Cameron (or elsewhere when in the judgment of the commission it is necessary), and cause a survey to be made to determine the names of the farmers, tenants, or other persons whose property has been destroyed or damaged or rendered unproductive to protect the cotton industry of the remainder of the State, and to determine the amount of loss accruing to them, and shall adjust these claims equitably and make payment to those persons at the earliest possible moment, so as to avert as much as possible unnecessary suffering and privation.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That the Pink Bollworm Commission of Louisiana shall keep accurate records of its work and of the disbursements made, as to expenditures and reimbursements to sufferers, and shall make a full report to the governor annually, or more often if he should require it.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Act No. 138.

An act (house bill No. 380, substitute for house bill No. 332) to impose an annual license tax upon the business of ginning cotton, crushing cotton seed, selling spot cotton on commission, or for profit, selling or buying cotton future round contracts, and cotton pickeries, so as to provide revenue for the protection of the cotton industry of Louisiana from pest ravages; to create the pink bollworm license tax fund out of the proceeds of this license tax; to define the several businesses to which this license tax applies and what comprises a cotton futures round contract; to provide for the method of collection and the date when it is collectible; and to provide for the disposition of any surplus arising in the fund.

Whereas the cotton fields of Louisiana have been invaded by a new pest known as the Mexican pink bollworm, whose ravages are declared by scientific authorities to be as bad or worse than those of the boll weevil; and limiting the operations of this act to two years; and Whereas it has been deemed necessary for the commissioner of agriculture to declare noncotton and regulated zones in certain areas in this State, so as to protect the remainder of the State from infestation and the possible annihilation of the cotton industry, and it has been and will continue to be the cause of great hardship to many persons who are thereby deprived of a means of livelihood and to whom the honor of the State has been pledged for a fair deal; and

Whereas it has been deemed necessary to create the pink bollworm commission of Louisiana, and to appropriate $250,000 a year for two years to meet this situation: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That an annual license tax, due and collectible on September 1 of each year, is hereby imposed and levied upon the carrying on of the following businesses:

(a) The ginning of cotton, which business is conducted by persons, firms, or corporations who receive the seed cotton from the producer and separate the lint from the seed, and put the lint up in bales of approximately 500 pounds each;

(b) The crushing of cotton seed, which business is conducted by persons, firms, or corporations at oil mills, who buy such seed by the ton and manufacture various products therefrom;

(c) The selling of spot cotton, which business is conducted by cotton commission merchants (as persons, firms, or corporations), who sell cotton on a commission basis, or for profit;

(d) The selling or buying of cotton future contracts, which business is conducted on exchanges by cotton future brokers (persons, firms, or corporations), on a commission basis, either for themselves or acting as agents for others. A cotton future round contract, for the purposes of this act, is hereby defined as being an agreement, contract, or other evidence of sale or purchase of every 100 bales or fraction thereof of cotton for future delivery, either purchased or sold through the agency of such broker;

(e) The cotton pickery business is that conducted by persons, firms, or corporations, in which soiled or damaged cotton is reginned, repicked, and rebaled, for which a charge is made.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That the annual license tax hereby imposed and levied is to be levied on the basis of the total number of transactions during the 12 months preceding August 1 of the year, and graduated for each business in the following manner:

(a) On the ginning of cotton:

50 bales or less	$4.00
51 to 100 bales	8.00
101 to 150 bales	12.00

And 8 cents per bale for each bale over 150.

(b) On the crushing of cotton seed:

50 tons or less	12.50
51 to 100 tons	25.00
101 to 150 tons	37.50

And 25 cents per ton for each ton over 150.

(c) On the selling of spot cotton on commission or for profit:

50 bales or less	4.00
51 to 100 bales	8.00
101 to 150 bales	12.00

And 8 cents per bale for each bale over 150.

(d) On the buying or selling of cotton future round contracts:

50 round contracts or less	12.50
51 to 100 round contracts	25.00
101 to 150 round contracts	37.50

And 25 cents per round contract for each one over 150.

(e) On the cotton pickery business:

50 bales or less	4.00
51 to 100 bales	8.00
101 to 150 bales	12.00

And 8 cents per bale for each bale over 150.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That it shall be the duty of every such ginner, crusher, cotton merchant, future broker, and cotton pickery to make annual returns of the total number of transactions within the purview of this act for the 12 months preceding August 1, on the 1st day of September of each year, one copy to be given to the State tax collector in the parish in which his business is domiciled at the time of the payment of the license tax herein provided; one copy to be forwarded to the treasurer of the State of Louisiana in Baton Rouge; and one copy to be forwarded to the supervisor of public accounts in Baton Rouge, who is hereby authorized to traverse the books of any business herein defined, for the purpose of verifying such statement. They are allowed 10 days of grace after September 1 in which to make both written return and cash payment, and falling in which they shall become delinquent and subject to the penalties for delinquency as provided in the general license law.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That if any such ginner, crusher, cotton merchant, future broker, or cotton pickery desires to take out a license for a six months' period instead of one year, that privilege is hereby granted, and such six months' license shall be based upon the number of transactions for the six months preceding August 1 and be due and collectible on September 1, as provided in sections 2 and 3 of this act. The license for the succeeding six months' period shall be based upon the transactions from August 1 to February 1 and shall be due and collectible on March 1, under the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this act.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That all State tax collectors shall open a separate account in which to record the collections of the license taxes herein provided, to be known as the pink bollworm license tax fund, and shall make separate return of such moneys to the treasurer of the State of Louisiana; that the treasurer of the State of Louisiana shall keep the proceeds of these license taxes separately in a fund to be known as the pink bollworm license tax fund, to be paid out as provided in the act creating the pink bollworm commission of Louisiana.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That when in the opinion of the pink bollworm commission of Louisiana, as expressed by a majority vote of said commission, and approved by the governor, any moneys in this fund not required for the purposes of the said commission shall be transferred to the general fund by the treasurer of the State of Louisiana: Provided, That the licenses imposed by this act shall be collected for two full years only.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That this act shall take effect and be of full force immediately after its passage.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be and the same are hereby repealed.

JAMES J. BAILEY,

Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the amount involved in this bill is not of very great consequence, but the principle involved and the precedent that would be established are of the greatest importance.

I can not help reverting back in memory to the time when pests ravaged the crops on the prairies of Kansas—the crops that were being raised by the pioneers. I remember well just what happened. Entire wheat fields would be swept down by chinch bugs. They would go from the wheat fields to the oat fields and destroy them, and then go into the corn fields and leave practically nothing for the farmer in the fall of the year. Those old pioneers never thought once that the Government of the United States was responsible for their having gone to the prairies of Kansas, where it was dry and where the chinch bug thrived better than crops, or responsible for the chinch bug that ravaged their crops. [Applause.] They did not appeal to the Congress of the United States to help them. They relied upon their own resources. The brave fight they made developed men and women and children who have made of Kansas a great, independent, forceful State, that stands and takes from all quarters any wind that blows. But if you pass this bill, I can conceive of a generation in Kansas—

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can conceive of a generation that might say, "We will not sow any wheat this fall, because the chinch bugs will take it next spring and the Government will pay us for the use of the land; and we will not sow any oats, and we will not plant any corn, because the Government pays for the use of land that lies idle, because if crops were put in they would be destroyed by pests." When the chinch bugs were taking everything in our section of the country, our people planted castor beans that the chinch bugs did not attack and we made a living. By this precedent you are making it possible to make the Government of the United States an insurer of every enterprise out of which people make a living if that enterprise fails. You are simply teaching the people that the Government of the United States was organized and created to do for the people what they alone can do for themselves.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I can not. There ought not to be a dollar appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose provided for in this bill. Is the cotton crop important? Yes; but no more so than wheat, no more so than oats, no more so than corn. Why should a Texas or Louisiana planter of cotton have the Government pay him for the use of his fallow land because if he plants it in cotton the pink bollworm takes it? Why, the Kansas and Oklahoma farmers might say the same thing about wheat and chinch bugs. I think they have chinch bugs in Oklahoma. We have them in Kansas. They have them in Missouri. They have them in Iowa. They have them where small grain crops are grown, which they attack, and the annual ravages of that one pest will aggregate into the hundreds of millions of dollars. Why, if you pass this bill we will all have to put our arms into the Treasury and have the Government of the United States insure everyone who loses in any enterprise he undertakes. There are more losses in other crops than there are in the cotton crop.

You Democrats were taught in the early days of your political party not to rely upon the Government of the United States but to rely upon yourselves for your success and your prosperity. You Republicans were never taught that the Government of the United States was to become the guardian and the insurer of the enterprises of the people of the United States in their investments or in their crop raising. Individual matters and individual enterprises depend upon the individual citizen. But as long as we appropriate money for the purpose proposed in this bill the bureaus in Washington will spend it to the ruin of all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, in two minutes one can not say very much, and yet he may say something. After listening to the speeches made by a number of very intelligent gentlemen it seems strange, indeed, that they have such peculiar views with reference to this matter. What would you think of the intelligence of gentlemen who have spoken against this resolution if they were to be asked to-day whether they would legislate to allow the use of eggs to build up the system of a person suffering from tuberculosis? That is all that the farmers of the South are asking now—a chance to allow the Agricultural Department of this Government to use its intelligence in the most intelligent way for the purpose of stamping out this pest, which if not done means the absolute destruction of this industry, an industry that concerns not only the people of the South, but the mills of Massachusetts. It means much to all civilized people who wear clothing. I tell you, gentlemen, we had better think a little in a great big broad way and not be so small. The gentleman talks about the chinch bug destroying the crops of Kansas! Do you suppose if the Government had found some way of circumscribing the ravages of the chinch bug that they would not have tried to do it? Of course they would, and that is what they are trying to do with the pink bollworm.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We had more courage than to ask them to do it.

Mr. MURPHY. The folks down in the cotton belt have plenty of courage, I find, and they can not raise a great many different kinds of crops on that land. Up where we live the wheat crop or the tobacco crop is the main money crop. What would we think if they should tell us we ought to plant no wheat or no tobacco, but that we ought to raise something else, when we knew that it could not be done? So let us be fair with the farmer to-day, no matter from which section of the country he comes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am certainly surprised and disappointed at some arguments that have been made by gentlemen hailing from some parts of this country. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] admonished my side of the House that we had been taught not to rely upon the Government but to rely upon ourselves. I will answer the gentleman by saying yes, and we are adhering to that; but we likewise have been taught to adhere to the Federal Constitution, which says you shall not take private property without just compensation. You gentlemen do not seem to understand the question involved here. It is not a question whether the farmers are going to grow cotton or not grow cotton. Our farmers are not asking the Government for anything; they are not beggars, nor do they ask anything at the hands of the Government but common justice. The question is whether or not the farmers' property is going to be taken by the strong hand of the law, Federal and State, without making just compensation therefor. That is what is proposed here, and your Department of Agriculture is generous enough to say that when the strong hand of the Federal Government is invoked in cooperation with the authority of the States, and when they say to the farmer, "You shall not plant your crop this year, because the very planting of that crop threatens the entire cotton crop of the world and threatens the very clothes that people wear," the Government shall pay a portion of the damages caused by thus taking away from the cotton farmer the right to plant cotton. This is no local matter, gentlemen. There is nothing local about it. It is as national as cotton goods are national. Do you men not know that the Federal Government proposes that if Texas grows cotton in that part of the State where the pink bollworm is, the Government will quarantine the State of Texas and try to hold within that State every bale of cotton that she grows? But your Secretary of Agriculture, being broad minded, has a vision not only of the South but of the North and the East and the West, and he realizes that the way for him to destroy and stop this threatened pest is to act in cooperation with the States, and if the farmer is compelled to stop the growing of cotton in these regions where the bollworm has appeared, then he shall be properly and justly compensated. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH].

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of principle I am opposed to Federal appropriations to make up individual losses, and as much as I think of the people of my State I would oppose the resolution if I did not believe it involved a national problem. I want to say that if the production of cotton in the South were reduced by one-half, either by voluntary abandonment of cotton acreage or by the ravages of the pink bollworm, the producers of cotton would receive just about as much for their half crop as they would receive from a full crop, but it would mean a tremendous loss to the men that buy the cotton from the producer, and it would consequently mean a tremendous loss to the ultimate consumer of cotton and cotton goods. High-priced cotton necessarily means high-priced cotton goods. I therefore find a clear distinction in this case from the ordinary case of the Federal Government making an appropriation to pay the losses of individuals. This is a national problem. It means as much to the people of the North and of the East as it does to the people of the South, and therefore I hope that my Republican friends over here, although they do not come from cotton-growing sections, will give this resolution their support. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I want to take a minute or two. I agree with the gentlemen who are contending that this is a national problem. There is no greater national problem that comes before this House than the proposal to take money out of the Federal Treasury to reimburse certain things. [Applause.] The distinguished agriculturist from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] adverted to the fact that I had opposed many measures introduced here in behalf of agriculture. I have, I think I have, on more than one occasion been the only gentleman in the House that voted against an appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department, and I believe the farmers of this country would be in a far better condition to-day if that department were abolished, and that the laboring people would be in a far better condition if the Department of Labor were abolished. We are encroaching on State rights year after year, and now the gentleman from Texas, who has just finished his speech, states that we are paying for property destroyed. The Federal Government did not order these nonproduction areas; the State orders them, and why should not the State bear the burden? Up in our section of the country in the eradication of the gypsy moth we are presented with a tax bill for the spraying of trees by the tree wardens in the various towns, and if we do not pay, we are subjected to a penalty. We believe that the pest should be eradicated, just as the producer of cotton ought to be willing to bear some expense of the eradication of the pink bollworm rather than to come around and ask to be reimbursed for not being permitted to grow cotton. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I said that I yielded the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I feel it my duty, occupying the position I do, to support the committees of the House if I can do it consistently, and frequently I go far afield in trying to adjust my views to the views of the committee. I should support the committee in this case did I not feel that they are inaugurating a policy which is exceedingly dangerous.

It is curious how gentlemen modify their principles in the face of an appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is not an appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentlemen on the minority side may be good Democrats except when there is an appropriation involved; otherwise they would probably be shouting to us in stentorian tones that we were interfering with State rights; but so long as we are proposing to pay Federal money to the States the little matter of interfering with State rights does not count.

In the country in which I live the State in the exercise of its sovereignty may, under its quarantine laws, deny owners the use of their own land for grazing purposes in order to prevent the spread of animal diseases. So far the State has never, so far as I know, reimbursed the owners for their losses in such an event. It would be entirely proper should the State see fit to do so, but I am satisfied the people of the State would under no circumstances expect the Federal Government to reimburse the State should the State meet what it believes to be its obligations in that event.

We should eradicate the pink boll weevil if we can and we may properly spend large sums of money in doing it, but when it comes to reimbursing individuals for losses that may arise through measures taken for the eradication of a pest or plant or animal diseases, we should be very careful, if we reimburse at all, that we reimburse only for actual, definite, unquestioned losses. We do now reimburse to a certain extent the owners of live stock for stock killed to prevent the spread of certain diseases. But that is a loss definite, unquestioned, easily determined, and if there is any obligation it may properly be considered partly a Federal obligation if the Federal Government participates in the procedure.

But here is a loss that if it be a loss at all is an uncertain one, a loss that can not be definitely determined. The State says to the owner of the land, you can not use your land for the growing of cotton, but he can use it for the growing of any other crop, and the most of us are of the opinion that in many parts of the cotton-growing region it would be a very good thing if the people grew less of cotton and a larger acreage of a variety of crops.

Very frequently I have no doubt the establishment of a non-cotton zone in the South is helpful rather than injurious, because it compels, or at least encourages, the planting and growing of other crops. It is by no means certain that the owner would not be better rewarded with some other crop he might plant than he would have been if he had planted cotton. If, as a matter of fact, the State noncotton zone is intelligently placed, the planting of cotton in such a zone even if allowed would in all probability bring little or no return, else the non-cotton zone should not be established. On the other hand, there is a wide variety of agricultural products that might be planted and that would bring an abundant return. Gentlemen, open this door, begin to use Federal money in the payment of uncertain indefinite obligations here and there fixed and established, not by Federal action or by any of the Federal agencies but by State and other agencies, and I do not know where you can stop. I know of no limit that could be placed on possible Federal obligations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has observed, I suppose, that the Secretary of Agriculture calls this a national menace in his letter. Is the gentleman familiar with this provision—

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposing the use of Federal money for the stamping out of this menace to cotton. I am opposed to the use of Federal money in the way that it is proposed and for the purposes set out in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson].

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman, of course one can not discuss the principles involved in this bill in the time allowed me. I want to say this, that this bill should not be looked upon as a bill for the South or the southern cotton farmer. The South would in a few years be better off without cotton, and if some pest should make the production of cotton impossible, the South would prosper. But what of your cotton mills in the North? The man who raises cotton with his own hands is destined to pauperism, in my judgment. One crop has been a curse to the South. You people of the North that have your mighty cotton factories, destroy this crop if you wish; you will not do us such a great injury, and it would prove a great blessing. The boll-weevil condition is bad enough, but if what is said of the pink bollworm be true, then, if not checked, it will destroy absolutely the cotton crop of the South. This bill did not originate with the committee of Congress. It did not originate with a southern Representative, but this method of destroying the pink bollworm originated with your Secretary of Agriculture, because it is the only way, and because the department thinks the situation can be handled successfully—that is, by destroying the cotton upon which this pest feeds in the infected districts—is the cheapest, surest, and most certain method of saving this great cotton crop which brings millions and millions of dollars into this country and which fixes the balance of trade in our favor. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said that he is not opposed to the destruction of the pink bollworm but is opposed to the payment of anything for the land. The great trouble is that you can not wreck the land in respect to a certain crop unless you are to remunerate the owner for it. If he, Mr. MONDELL, is in earnest in saying that he favors an appropriation to destroy this pest, then he must favor its use for the purpose of destroying the evil, and if the only way to do it legally is to pay for the crop, then he must favor paying for the cotton.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN].

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am indeed sorry that I have no further time to talk to you upon this subject. I coincide with what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] just said. I come from a State that is directly between the North and the South. You have heard a great many people from the South this afternoon talk about the boll weevil, experts on the boll weevil; on the other hand, you have heard the chinch-bug expert from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I came originally from the great State of Kansas, and know all about the chinch bug, and I pride myself on knowing a little about the boll weevil, and I want to say to you in the one minute that I have that the chinch bug is no more to be compared with the pink bollworm than is the East with the West. They are entirely two separate and distinct insects, and act in an entirely different way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GENSMAN. I say to you that this bill should receive your support; that you ought to take care of this pink bollworm.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this measure has been characterized as a vicious measure. If you fail to pass the resolution then the taking over of 50,000 acres in one tract and 22,000 acres in another without compensation, is a vicious measure, and you have very correctly characterized it. Gentlemen say that it is not on a par with the payment of indemnities for live stock destroyed. Suppose the Government takes a building over for the use of the Post Office Department. Would anyone suggest taking it over without paying compensation for it? The proposition here is to take over 50,000 acres of land in one tract and 22,000 in another.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman has had his time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. By what authority does the gentleman say that the United States takes over a building for a post office without compensation?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman has referred to the grasshoppers and the chinch bugs, and it is said that they did not have courage enough down there to come up to Congress and ask for an appropriation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I said that we had too much courage.

Mr. HAUGEN. They had the courage and they came, and Congress gave them an appropriation. The gentleman said that we should specify. The gentleman has drafted bills. He has assisted in passing a number of bills. When did he suggest that specification should be put in the bill to take over the railroads? Money was then paid by Congress in lump-sum appropriations, by the billions of dollars, but when it comes to asking $200,000 out of a $554,000 appropriation already made and now available for the use of the farmers, the gentleman says that we must specify, that Congress must specify in the legislation what the terms of the contract shall be. Much has been said about what we should do for the farmer, but when it comes to an appropriation for a small sum to help the farmer, then someone suggests that we must specify. However, when it is a matter of paying out billions of dollars to the railroads or for other purposes, no question is ever asked.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That when any State shall have enacted legislation and taken measures, including the establishment and enforcement of noncotton zones, adequate, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, to eradicate the pink bollworm in any area thereof actually infested or threatened by such pest, the said Secretary, under regulations to be prescribed by him, is authorized, out of the appropriation of $554,840 for "Eradication of pink bollworm" made by the Agricultural appropriation act of March 3, 1921, to utilize not to exceed $200,000 in reimbursing such States for expenses incurred by them in compensating any farmer for his loss due to the enforced nonproduction of cotton within said zones: Provided, That such reimbursement of any State shall be based upon the fair rental value of said land; that such reimbursement shall not exceed one-third the amount actually paid by the State to any farmer, and in no event shall exceed $5 per acre; and that no reimbursement shall be made in respect of any farmer who has not complied in good faith with all quarantine and control regulations prescribed by said Secretary of Agriculture and such State relative to the pink bollworm.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois and Mr. HAUGEN rose.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is an amendment to the bill not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is in order. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 2, line 5, strike out "fair rental value" and insert "actual loss suffered by the owner" in lieu thereof.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Am I entitled to five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I was a member of the Illinois Legislature when the foot-and-mouth epidemic swept over our country. I presume that in my particular district it was more prevalent than any other place in our State, and being conversant with the situation I want to call attention now to what happened down there in our State during the prevalence of the disease. The Federal Government through the Congress appropriated considerable sums to stamp out that disease. Our State also appropriated many millions of dollars for the same purpose. The two agencies cooperated throughout the State, and they went about the State making quarantine areas. They destroyed large herds of cattle and hogs; they destroyed a good many of our cattle and hogs which were not at all infected and were perfectly healthy. They made quarantine areas where the roads were shut up and people could not travel. They did not permit farmers in those areas to thrash their crops and they rotted in the fields. A vast number of acres laid fallow in that State in that year. Herds of pure-bred cattle were slaughtered, and farmers were paid the price of ordinary beef. This was done all over the State, and the bills began coming into the Illinois Legislature for allowance for the losses suffered by the people. We did not allow a single bill of that kind. Nobody was allowed but the actual cash damage that they suffered by the killing of their stock, valued at their fair cash beef or swine value, and the value of the buildings which were burned down in trying to stamp out that disease. Nobody thought of claiming anything for his land that lay fallow, although a good many men wanted an appropriation to be made because of the loss of their crops that rotted in the fields. Now, what is this proposition? Did anybody in this House ever hear of an appropriation made by the Congress to a State to reimburse a State for money which it had paid out on its own account in stamping out a disease? If anybody did I would like to know it now. So far as I know, this is the first example of the kind that has ever happened in the history of the country. Now, I am in favor of stamping out the bollworm. I voted for the appropriation, and I will vote other millions for that purpose, but I do object to laying down the proposition that we are to contribute from the Federal Treasury to the State for the purpose of paying fair rental to men who have not farmed their land, and that is what this bill does.

The amendment I have offered is to fix the basis of the amount to be paid on the actual loss that is occasioned. Do you think it is proper for the authorities of your State to go to some man and say, "Smith, you must not farm this land in cotton," and that then he can remain idle and get the fair rental value of his land? Should he not try to make as much production as possible by planting something else if he can and recover only what he has actually lost? Ought he not to decrease the damage as much as possible?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas rose.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have not the time to yield. In the first place, I am very doubtful in my mind as to the wisdom of passing this bill, but if it is going to be passed let us put this safety provision in it so that when the Government agents go to settle these claims they can say to the man, "If you did not farm the land, why not?" and if they did not produce a crop, let it be settled at the actual loss which they suffered. Fifteen dollars an acre, gentlemen, is a pretty good rental for such land. If the farmer can raise a crop of corn or something else, he has no right to let his land lie fallow and depend upon the Government to pay him its full rental value.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. Of course, I assume that if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois you will strike out, in line 8, the limitation of $5 an acre, because he says that his proposition is that the farmer who is prohibited from planting ought to be paid for his actual loss. If that is to be the measure of his damage, then there ought to be no limit whatever. But I am entirely satisfied, as I am sure gentlemen on the other side of the House are, with the bill as it stands. You will find that with the limitation of $5 an acre it will cost the State and the Government much less money than if you pay the owner for the actual loss sustained by his failure to grow cotton, because the cotton crop in certain sections of the South is the only crop that can be raised with any profit. If you prohibit the farmer from raising cotton and estimate the real loss which he may sustain, the Government will be obligated for an amount much larger than $5 per acre.

But aside from that, I want to say just a few words on this bill. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House to the fact that the Government has already appropriated $544,000 to exterminate the pink bollworm, for use during the present fiscal year. That money will be spent whether you adopt this resolution or not. I want to spend that money, and it seems to me that gentlemen on this side of the House ought to want to spend it in a manner that will really accomplish some results.

When you adopted the provision for exterminating the pink bollworm the supposition was you really wanted to kill it. If you want to kill him, and are going to instruct the department to kill him, for God's sake, kill him in the way the Department of Agriculture says he can be killed and the only way in which he can be killed. You give the Department of Agriculture $544,000 and tell it to go ahead and kill the pink bollworm, but you tell it to kill it in a particular way and no other. The Department of Agriculture comes back and says, "Boss, we can not kill the pink bollworm in the way you told us to kill it, with this $544,000, but if you let us use $200,000 of that in another way, we can kill it." But Congress says, "Go on and spend that money like we told you to." The Secretary of Agriculture says, "I can not kill this snake in any other way than with a stick. I have a knife that I can trade off and get a stick with." Congress replies: "You shall not have a stick. Get out that pocketknife and cut his head off, like I told you to do. I do not care how the money is spent. I appropriated that money simply to get it out of the Treasury. I am not concerned with whether it effects the result or not."

Now, let us be sensible. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that he is very much concerned; that it is a national question when you appropriate money out of the Public Treasury. So am I concerned. I am also concerned, though, when we do appropriate money out of the Public Treasury, in knowing that it is going to accomplish some useful purpose. Now, the Department of Agriculture ought to want to spend the money of the Federal Government effectively and efficiently and to get results. That department says the only way it can stamp out the pink bollworm is in cooperation with the States; is to induce the States to pass laws that shall say to the people, "You shall not plant cotton at all in this certain territory." And it is the only way you can stamp it out. Now, neither the State nor the Federal Government can take the property of a citizen without compensating him, and that is the situation that confronts us.

The States will bear two-thirds of the expense, and the Federal Government, according to the Secretary of Agriculture, will save money, because he says it now costs $10 an acre to pull the bolls under the present method, and with a rental of $5 per acre cotton may not be grown in the noncotton zones and the pest speedily exterminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this proposition seems to me a very simple one. The cotton crop, which is a national asset, is threatened by the pink bollworm. The experts have said that a certain method is the best and most practical way to destroy the pest, or, rather, to avert that evil. That plan contemplates the strong arm of the Federal Government and of the State governments, saying to a farmer, "You shall not exercise your inherent privilege of growing any crop you please on your land and should be restrained from doing that for the general public good." All right. Then you propose to compensate that man properly. I think the measure of compensation offered by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is right and fair, and I am going to support it because no citizen is entitled to accept compensation other than that which he actually loses by yielding his private right to the public good.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] says—

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I have but five minutes, and I would rather not.

The gentleman from Texas says he is opposed to the pending amendment because another provision limits the payment to $5 an acre. I wish I could get somebody to underwrite the cotton crop in my district next year and guarantee the farmers $5 net profit an acre on the crop, because I fear he will not get cost of production. If there is a man down there in that cotton zone whose land is not fit for anything but cotton, he can show that he has lost the entire value of his cotton crop. But, on the other hand, if he finds that he can, by the exercise of proper diligence and by the same amount of labor that he would devote to the production of a cotton crop, raise a crop of a different kind that would compensate him, then in equity he is entitled only to the difference between what he would have received if he had produced a cotton crop and what he gets from the crop that he grew in lieu thereof.

Let me say to my friends of the cotton belt, it is always best to bottom your proposition on that which is fair and on that which you can defend. If we agree to accept a proposition to compensate a man for his actual loss, then I can see that there are some gentlemen on this side who as a business proposition can support your proposition on a business basis. But I can imagine the doubts that confront a man when it is proposed to give somebody a specific sum for the rental of his property, whether he loses or suffers any loss or not.

I do not believe in that attitude. I believe in compensating a man for the actual loss he has sustained; and then, having done that, he has no complaint when the public has compelled him to yield his private rights for the public good. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Chairman, I propose to oppose the bill for reasons as to which I may possibly be in error; and if I am in error, I shall be pleased to be corrected. I understand the argument is made here that this specific sum of $554,840 was appropriated for the purpose of assisting in the eradication of the boll weevil; and, so far as that goes, it meets with my hearty approval, and I would be happy to see the money expended in that way. But this resolution provides that $200,000 of that money may not be used for that purpose; and, as I understand the purpose of this resolution, it is not to continue the fight against the boll weevil, but it is to reimburse various States—

Mr. RANKIN. This resolution has nothing to do with the boll weevil.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. It is to reimburse the States.

Mr. RANKIN. It is the pink bollworm.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Well, there is a lot of "bull" about it, weevil or worm. [Laughter.] I think the gentleman understands what I am referring to.

Mr. RANKIN. There is a lot of "bull" about that speech, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I understand. But the point I am trying to make out is this: In the case of this $200,000, as I understand it, the theory is that the money has already been expended, and that this is to reimburse the States.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is in error about that. The appropriation was made for the current year.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I understand it is to reimburse the various States for the excessive expenses they have incurred in compensating the farmers for losses in the nonproduction of cotton in the so-called zones.

Now, if that is the case, what would prevent the States, after securing this $200,000 for the purpose of reimbursing the States for money they have expended for this purpose, from spending that money on roads, or in paying salaries in the States? There is nothing in this resolution to prevent that. The money is appropriated to reimburse the States for moneys expended in that way, without direction as to how that money of the Federal Government is to be expended.

Mr. HAUGEN. The State of Louisiana has already appropriated money.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. This is for the purpose of reimbursement. How can you reimburse a State, or how can you reimburse anybody for anything, unless the amount has already been expended? What is the meaning of the word "reimburse"? That is an essential word in this resolution. So I say that this money, under the wording of this resolution, can be expended to build roads, or to pay salaries, or for any purpose for which the State legislatures see fit to use it if they, on their part, have spent the money in reimbursing farmers for the use of their land. There is no restrictive clause here that prevents them from doing it. My chief objection to this bill is that I do not believe that Congress has the right to turn over to the agencies of a State moneys to be expended by authority of the officers in a particular State. The money of the Federal Government is raised by the collection of taxes under laws passed by the Congress, and it is to be expended by Congress through its recognized agencies; and if this $554,840, the money of the United States, is to be expended by the United States Department of Agriculture, well and good, but I do not think we have the authority to allow this money to be expended by the agricultural department of any particular State. I do not think we are warranted under any circumstances in paying the money out of the Treasury of the United States and placing it in the treasury of a particular State, and allowing it to be expended by men over whom we have no control, and who are not answerable to Congress for the way in which the money is expended. In my opinion it is proposed in this bill that Congress, without devising the agencies which shall supervise the expenditure of this money, is to take $200,000 from the Treasury of the United States and put it into the treasuries of the different States, and that it is wholly without our scope and wholly beyond our power to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate is closed.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this resolution and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this resolution and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object. I make the point of order that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I rise to make a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting between the words "actual" and "loss" the additional words "and necessary," so that the amendment will read "actual and necessary losses."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the respect indicated. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by inserting, after the word "actual," the words "and necessary," so that the language will read "actual and necessary losses."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all. The Chair held that all debate was exhausted. That was on the amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it all depends upon considering the pro forma amendment withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Then I renew the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The amendment was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Another gentleman offered an amendment to that amendment, to strike out the last word, so that the motion to close debate was on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and the amendment of the gentleman who offered the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, so that I think the gentleman from Illinois is wrong in saying that debate is closed only on the amendment to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that debate has been closed on all pending amendments, but the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois to offer a further amendment.

Mr. MANN. I do not care to do so.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last two words and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me that there are a great many Members who do not understand the real conditions involved in this legislation. In the first place, there are men on the Republican side of the House who are not familiar with the cotton-growing industry who seem to think that the pink bollworm is now destroying all the cotton in the sections where it has made its appearance, and that the farmers would lose their crop planted on the land regardless of whether noncotton zones were declared or not, as is proposed by the Agriculture Department. The truth is, gentlemen of the committee, that such is not the case. There has not been very much cotton actually destroyed by the pink bollworm in the sections that have been invaded by them, and it is desired to use this money largely as a precautionary measure and not in any sense as insurance in favor of the farmers to protect them against the ravages of the bollworm. In other words, the experts who have gone there from the Department of Agriculture and other experts already on the ground under the direction of the several State authorities hold that unless these noncotton zones are established the pests in the near future will undoubtedly increase rapidly in numbers and spread over larger territory and ultimately destroy from 30 to 50 per cent of the entire cotton crop of the Nation.

Now, what is the real situation? The Federal Government, acting under the direction of its Department of Agriculture, has advised the States in the sections where the pest has made its appearance that if the States do not take the necessary precautionary measures, such as the establishment of the noncotton zones, the Federal Government will quarantine against the State so failing to meet these requirements. In other words, the Federal Government is undertaking to deal with this problem, and should at least do its part in carrying the financial burdens that will necessarily be imposed upon the innocent farmers who may become involved by reason of the efforts in common to suppress this pest.

Who is to blame for this situation? Are the States lying on the border responsible for the conditions? The pest has come from Egypt into Mexico and from Mexico into the United States. We did not bring them across the border. They came here through commerce with foreign countries, and we all know that the American Government and not the State governments regulate and control foreign commerce. You brought the pest here through commerce which you regulate, and the Government as a whole, and not any particular section, is responsible for the appearance of the pink bollworm.

In view of these facts, is it fair for the Federal Government to insist upon the enforcement of certain noncotton zone regulations which require as a precautionary measure that men living 3 to 5 miles from where any of the pests have been found must forego the planting of their main crop? Many of the people involved own small tracts of land from 80 to 160 acres.

It is all they have upon which to sustain themselves and families, and cotton is the only crop that will furnish them a means of earning a living on this land, and if you destroy this right through the agencies of the Government they are undoubtedly entitled to some just compensation and the Federal Government should contribute its part in payment of the actual loss they must thus sustain. You have already established a precedent for this. Many times before the Federal Government has made appropriations to pay for cattle that were killed to prevent the spread of the foot-and-mouth disease, and tuberculosis in cattle, and there is no difference in principle in what has been done and what you are now asked to do, and I trust that the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House will understand the situation as it really exists and in voting on this question will keep in mind the fact that the pest was brought here through means of commerce which the American Government, and not the State governments, controls and regulates.

I wish I had time to discuss this matter more fully, because it seems to me that it ought to appeal to the men on the opposite side of the aisle who must of necessity depend, indirectly at least, upon the cotton crop of the South. It ought to appeal to the men of the North who touch elbows with the men of the South. It ought to appeal to the men of the East who touch elbows with the men of the West, because together we are fighting a great national pest, one which is threatening the destruction of the cotton industry of America.

I hope that the gentlemen of the committee, regardless of the section from which they come, will not view this from a narrow or partisan standpoint, because to do so, in my judgment, would be unjust and unfair and contrary to the real spirit of cooperation that should prevail throughout the entire country. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on all amendments to the paragraph and all amendments to the bill close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on all amendments to the paragraph and all amendments to the bill close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois to his own amendment: After the word "actual" and before the word "loss" insert the words "and necessary."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment to the amendment is to insert the words "and necessary." It has been suggested to me by some Members that if we put in only the word "actual" the same result may occur—that is, a man might let his land lie fallow—but if we put in the words "and necessary," we will supply the other element which will make it a good amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the original amendment as amended.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened to all the arguments on this resolution, and after having listened to all of them I shall vote for the resolution.

There is considerable confusion in regard to what this does. It is not an appropriation at all. I hold in my hand the Agricultural bill which you have already passed, and on page 35 is a section for the eradication of the pink bollworm, in which you appropriate $554,840. Now, this resolution permits the Agricultural Department to take some of that money which you have already appropriated for that very purpose and use it more scientifically than you have provided for in the appropriation bill. This resolution has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and the scientists of the Department of Agriculture, and they have come to you in a letter from the Secretary asking you to pass this measure. Now, that is all there is in the controversy. The details are all to be worked out by legislation in the different States, and I want to say that I commend the committee for leaving it to the States and giving the States the right to lay down the rule by which this money is to be paid to the farmers. That is the proper way to do it. The pink bollworm is a great national calamity; it is not a small, sectional matter. Some people wonder why the National Government helps in these matters. In my district a few years ago we had the foot-and-mouth disease, and the National Government paid out in that district hundreds of thousands of dollars to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease, which is a cold-weather disease. This, the pink bollworm, is a disease attacking the cotton-growing sections of the country. I do not pretend to be an expert on how to stamp it out. I presume the men who have brought the measure in, the agricultural scientists in the Department of Agriculture, know what they are talking about. There is no money to be paid out by them directly. The money is all appropriated and they are permitted to pay this money, to the States to be paid out to individual farmers under the laws laid down by the States. I hope we have enough big, broad-minded men in this House to pass this measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my amendment may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "fair, reasonable value" and insert in lieu thereof "actual and necessary losses suffered by the owner."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate joint resolution 72, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH), there were 102 ayes and 47 noes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present, and I object to the vote on that account.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 177, nays 84, answered "present" 2, not voting 167, as follows:

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PELLAGRA IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, a report has been put out by one of the departments here in Washington that a great many people of the South are suffering from pellagra, and are in destitute circumstances. The truth of the matter is that the high price which is charged them by the railroads and the low price paid for farm products has brought about the only embarrassment that exists in my country, which is the State of Oklahoma. I have just received the following telegram which I shall ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the telegram.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the telegram, as follows:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., July 27, 1921.

Hon. JIM McCLINTIC, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Propaganda about pellagra in the South, especially Oklahoma, is groundless. I look upon it as vicious, malicious, and calculated to injure the South. Oklahoma has never had better crops or greater food supply than at the present time. With 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, 120,000,000 bushels of corn, good cotton crops, with vegetables and truck patches, and cattle selling at 3 cents per pound, food is especially plentiful in rural districts. What we need is assistance in stabilizing prices on our great variety and bountiful crop and live stock. Oklahoma resents imputations of lack of food or varieties, and brands it as malicious propaganda. Furnish copy of telegram to other Members.

J. A. WHITEHURST,
President State Board of Agriculture.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call of committees.

EXPOSITION AT PORTLAND, OREG.

The Clerk called the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I call up Senate joint resolution No. 5, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 5) authorizing the President to invite foreign nations to take part in an exposition at Portland, Oreg., in 1925.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to invite foreign countries to participate in an exposition to be held in the city of Portland, State of Oregon, in the year 1925, to celebrate the completion of transcontinental and Pacific highways, the centennial of the invention of the electromagnet, and to exemplify the development of hydroelectric energy: Provided, That the United States Government shall be put to no expense by reason of the extending of the invitation.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution passed the Senate unanimously on June 6, and is unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. It is in the usual form, and similar resolutions have many times been adopted in that form by the Congress preliminary to other expositions of national and international character. It provides that the passage of the resolution shall subject the United States Government to no expense.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What is the date at which these foreign Government are to be invited?

Mr. ROGERS. Nineteen hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this is a forerunner of an exposition?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And I presume that language properly interpreted means that hereafter we are to be called upon for appropriations for exhibits at that exposition.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, as far as the information of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is concerned, this is the end of the Federal Government's participation in this exposition. It is possible, of course, that the exposition as it develops may request the Federal Government to have a Federal building at the exposition itself, but I am assured by the sponsors of the resolution, both in the Senate and the House, that there is no intention of calling upon the Federal Government for an appropriation to aid in the actual exposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is to be in 1925?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And this is 1921. That is, the exposition is to be four years hence. Is there any hurry about this resolution?

Mr. ROGERS. There is this hurry in all these cases: Those who are behind the exposition in Oregon—and they include the governor of the State of Oregon and the mayor of Portland—are naturally anxious to know, as far as practicable and as long ahead as practicable, what the probable scope of this exposition is to be. They have incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000,000. They propose to have this a great international fair, the greatest international fair, with the exception of San Francisco, that has ever been held west of the Mississippi. It is natural for them to want to know whether the exposition is, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, to have the sanction of the Federal Government, and it is important for them in proceeding with their plans to know whether they are to be allowed to have foreign Governments invited to participate. I may say to the gentleman further that the practice of Congress has been in many cases, some of which are set forth in the report, to grant this authority from two to three years and in some cases four years before the actual date of the exposition. This is a very large enterprise, and, of course, it can not be undertaken or put through overnight.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a little time on the resolution after the gentleman has concluded.

Mr. ROGERS. I should be very glad to yield to the gentleman now. How much time does he desire?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to seem either narrow or ungracious, but I can not escape the feeling that under the world's conditions which now prevail it would be wise to postpone the consideration of this resolution at least for a few months. I speak not only of the world conditions with respect to the feeling that exists between nations but of the financial condition of the world. This does not seem to me to be the time when a resolution of this kind should pass. It may be that a few months from now, after, for instance, a disarmament conference has been held, we might be in much better situation to determine what we desire to do in respect to this. I wish very much that the gentleman from Massachusetts would agree to postpone the consideration of the resolution. If the gentleman is not willing to do that, of course, if I can get an opportunity to do so, I shall move to postpone it. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the constituents of each and every Member of Congress are looking to him to help decrease the burden of taxation. There is but one way to do that, and that is to quit spending. Uncle JOE CANNON has well said that every time we spend we have got to tax to make up for it, and I have made up my mind definitely upon one thing, and that is that I am not going to vote for a single other proposition in this House which is unnecessary that can be gotten along without which involves the expenditure of the people's money. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has well said that this is a matter that we can rest upon our oars with respect to just now, especially when it is four years off, and when we men know absolutely that just as sure as we pass this resolution it is going to call for large appropriations out of the Treasury in the future.

Why, the people of Oregon will come back here and say, "You did not treat us right. You invited foreign Governments over here to our exposition, and you did it by act of Congress; you wanted them to come to Portland and see an exposition that is not backed by the Federal Government, upon which the Federal Government has not spent any money, and we want you now to come across with a good, fat, liberal appropriation." That is what is going to follow the passage of this resolution, and I am one man who is not going to vote for it. I am one man who is going to vote against every such proposition in this House until we get our Government upon its feet financially and decrease the taxation that is now laid so heavily upon the shoulders of our people. The people of the United States have just one thought now above all else, and that is for us to take off some of the burden and get back to normalcy. How are you going to do it? Keep on spending? Keep on doing this and doing that which takes more money? We do not do it privately when we are in a hard shape financially. Personally, when we have to make ends meet through great effort we stop and take a survey of our affairs and see to it that the receipts at least equal our disbursements, and we economize. Why, we ought to stop this everlasting spending and we ought to set aside this resolution, and if the majority sees fit to force it upon us we ought to defeat its passage.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I wonder if the gentleman from Texas could secure the figures to insert in his remarks the amount of the several appropriations for the various great expositions that we have had in this country such as the one at Philadelphia, Buffalo, St. Louis, New Orleans, and the western coast. As one Member I would like to know something about what we are likely to be called upon to appropriate.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman from West Virginia for his suggestion. We are indebted to the committee report for the following figures showing the cost to the Government, as follows:

1876. Philadelphia.—International Centennial Exposition, May 10 to Nov. 10, 1876:
National appropriation.....	$2, 183, 184.50
1884. New Orleans, La.—World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, Dec. 16, 1883, to June 30, 1884:
National appropriation.....	1, 650, 000.00
1893. Chicago.—World's Columbian Exposition, May 1 to Oct. 30, 1893:
National appropriation.....	5, 840, 329.64
1895. Atlanta, Ga.—Cotton States and Industrial Exposition, Sept. 15 to Dec. 31, 1895:
National appropriation.....	200, 000.00
1897. Nashville, Tenn.—Tennessee Centennial Exposition, May 1 to Oct. 31, 1897:
National appropriation.....	130, 000.00
1898. Omaha, Nebr.—Trans-Mississippi Exposition, June 1 to Nov. 1, 1898:
National appropriation.....	240, 000.00
1901. Buffalo, N. Y.—Pan-American Exposition, May 1 to Nov. 2, 1901:
National appropriation.....	1, 015, 000.00
1901. Charleston, S. C.—South Carolina International State and West Indian Exposition, Dec. 1, 1901, to June 1, 1902:
National appropriation.....	250, 000.00

1904. St. Louis, Mo.—Louisiana Purchase Exposition, Apr. 30 to Dec. 1, 1904: National appropriation	$11,122,500.00
1905. Portland, Oreg.—Lewis and Clark Exposition, June 1 to Oct. 1, 1905: National appropriation	485,000.00
1907. Jamestown, Va.—Jamestown Ter-Centennial Ex- position, Apr. 26 to Nov. 30, 1907: National appropriation	2,650,000.00
1909. Seattle, Wash.—Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, June 1 to Oct. 16, 1909: National appropriation	600,000.00

But, Mr. Speaker, the amount of money appropriated by the Government for these expositions is only a very small part of the expense to the people connected therewith. We all know that it is a very expensive trip to Portland, Oreg. We all know that for people properly to attend that exposition as it should be, if it be one of international importance, it would require the people of this country to spend much money that some of them are not able to spend, and sometimes people do spend money that they ought not to spend when they are tempted to do so in such cases, and I say we ought to hesitate before we pass a bill of this kind. It behooves our Government to be economical. And just now it behooves all of our people individually to be economical. Let us get our Government on its feet first and then will be time enough to have expositions and rejoicings.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR]. [Applause.]

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, the enterprising citizens of the State of Oregon, speaking through the legislative assembly which met last winter, the various commercial bodies, the council of the city of Portland, and the enterprising men and women who have inaugurated and organized this great exposition company, come forward at this time and ask the Federal Government to give them authority to invite foreign nations to participate in an exposition of world-wide importance which will be held in the city of Portland in 1925. We propose to hold an exposition there backed by our own money, our own enterprise, and our own foresightedness, and we believe we will have something there to display, something that the world will be glad to journey there to see. I trust, gentlemen, that you will give us this authority, because we are in earnest about this matter. We held an exposition in Portland in 1905. It was a great success. Another was held in the city of Seattle in 1909, and it was a great success. You all know of the great success attendant upon the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco in 1915. This proposed exposition will be unique because we expect to exemplify the use of electric energy which will be generated in that part of the country from our tremendous water power.

Now, we are asking Congress to permit us to invite foreign nations to participate in this exposition. Later on there will undoubtedly be an invitation to the Federal Government to participate, and at that time it will be incumbent upon Congress to determine whether or not the Government will make an exhibit, but at this time we are asking nothing. We are not seeking to impose any obligation upon the United States, but we are merely asking the Congress to give us permission to make this great affair international in its scope.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McARTHUR. I will.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does not the gentleman know that in all probability the Government of the United States will be called upon finally to appropriate about $5,000,000 in order properly to be represented at this exposition?

Mr. McARTHUR. The Government of the United States will not be called upon to appropriate anything like $5,000,000. The Government appropriated for the 1905 exposition in Portland, Oreg., $485,000. We are in earnest about this matter. We hope that you will give us a favorable vote upon this resolution in order that we may go ahead with our plans.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I am in absolute accord with the people of Oregon in wanting this exposition. That of 1905 drew the people from all over the world to Portland. It showed the people of Texas what they had in the North, and it showed the people of other countries what we had in the North as well as in Texas. And speaking about normal times, the gentleman from Texas seems to think that we are going to get back to normal times by being pessimists. The only way to get back is to have a little vision and optimism, for everyone to work and feel like spending a normal amount of money. We can not get down to normal again until we begin spending again and putting people back to work, and you can not do it until you believe in the future.

Mr. McARTHUR. I agree with my friend, and I wish to say that the Rocky Mountain States and the Pacific Coast States are back of this legislation, and that it has been indorsed by all of the commercial clubs of the great West.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The suggestion I have to make may have been made before, but if so, I did not hear it. In all probability is not this the first chance for the nations of the world to get together in a peaceful way for the purpose of showing what has been accomplished under the arts of peace since the Great War?

Mr. McARTHUR. I think the gentleman has stated it correctly.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I heard the testimony before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of those who were before us in advocacy of this resolution. In my judgment the time, 1925, will be very opportune for the holding of that exposition. For, as the gentleman who has just taken his seat has said, it will afford the first opportunity after the close of the World War for the peoples of the earth to get together at an exposition of this character. And in this respect the exposition will be of vast importance. But it will be very important also in many other ways, and chiefly, in my judgment, because it will show the world as has never before been possible the actualities and the possibilities of hydroelectric development. There is, I think, no reading man who is at the same time a thinking man but will agree that hydroelectric power is destined to work a transformation in the industries of the world greater than has steam. The transformation is going to be even more wonderful not only industrially but also and especially in promoting the comfort and real happiness of men. This exposition is to be held in a State which has, according to expert engineers, 11,000,000 potential electric horsepower. There are 3,000,000 of such horsepower in one river a few miles away. Great currents are to be brought onto the grounds and facilities created for the most magnificent display of hydroelectric development that the world has even seen. Nobody can tell what immeasurable benefits this will bring to the business interests of every nation and to mankind generally. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, of course I take pride, as every other citizen does, in the greatness and glory of the Golden West, and I should be glad, if I could see my way clear, to vote for the initial step proposed to be taken here, calculated, if successful, to establish at Portland, Oreg., another exposition to be financed in part by the Federal Government. But the time has come when we should stop preaching economy unless we propose to practice what we preach by ceasing to authorize all expenditures that are not imperatively necessary. We went upon the hustings last campaign and promised the people all sorts of economies, and yet the proponents of this resolution ask us to vote for it, well knowing that if the resolution is adopted the Government will be in honor bound and obliged to spend a vast sum of money in support of the proposed exposition out of the Federal Treasury.

The State governments will also be expected to make appropriations for exhibits and the like, and the people will be expected, in addition, to visit the exposition, calling for a further great cost and expense.

I wish to direct your attention to what other expositions have cost the Federal Government. In 1876, when we had the Philadelphia Exposition, this Government appropriated $2,183,000; the Atlanta (Ga.) Exposition in 1881 did not cost us anything, but the one at New Orleans in 1884 cost us $1,650,000; the one at Chicago in 1893 cost us $5,840,000; the one at Atlanta in 1895 cost $200,000; the one at Nashville in 1897 cost us $130,000; the one at Omaha in 1898 cost us $240,000; the one at Buffalo in 1901 cost us $1,015,000; the one at Charleston, S. C., in 1901, cost us $250,000; the one at St. Louis in 1904 cost us $11,122,000; the Jamestown Exposition in 1907 cost us $2,650,000; the one at Seattle in 1909 cost us $600,000.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Tell us what the other exposition at Portland cost.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The Portland (Oreg.) Exposition held only a few years ago I am reserving for the last, because in 1905 Portland took out of Uncle Sam's Treasury $485,000. And now Portland is here again laying the foundation for another donation for exposition purposes. I suggest, if we mean to keep faith with those who sent us here, if we mean to live within the letter and spirit of the promises we made, if we propose to fulfill the obligations we are under to the people who voted for us, we will vote against this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who just preceded me has advised the House as to what former expositions cost the United States Government, but he did not say, and I do not believe he will say now, that that was not money well spent. [Applause.] I have never heard any criticism of Congress for appropriations heretofore made in order to assist people of this Nation in making known to the world through these expositions the achievements of the American people. [Applause.] I am in favor of economy, but there is no economy in taking steps to prevent a great exposition such as is contemplated by the great State of Oregon. I feel we ought to encourage those public-spirited, wide-awake, progressive people of that great empire State of the West in making known to the people of the United States and of the world what they have achieved in that great Commonwealth in so short a time. This resolution calls for no appropriation, but even if its passage results in a small appropriation hereafter, it will be for a good cause. I call to the attention of my Democratic colleagues from the South to the fact that most of the western Members voted to-day for the bill making appropriation to aid in protecting the cotton farmers of the South from the ravages of the pink boll weevil. Should we not vote for their resolution simply authorizing the President to invite foreign countries to participate in the exposition to be held at Portland, Oreg., in 1925, especially as the resolution expressly provides that the United States is to be put to no expense by reason of extending the invitation? I shall vote for the resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the membership of the House will not listen to the suggestion or the appeal that this matter be deferred to another time. This exposition has already been inaugurated by the energetic citizens of the State of Oregon. The enterprise has already received the enthusiastic indorsement of all of the Pacific Coast States and many of the interior States, and I trust that Congress itself will not throw a wet blanket upon what promises to be one of our great expositions.

Some gentlemen strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] opposes this bill. He fears a future appropriation. There is not a dollar of appropriation provided for in this bill. A few moments ago I voted in favor of a $200,000 appropriation for the eradication of the pink bollworm, and doubtless a large share of that money is going into his State, the State of Texas. [Applause.]

This exposition is designed to call the attention of the Nation to its great assets. Come to Oregon, come to Washington, and see what you have reserved as the wood lot for the Nation. Nearly 30,000,000 acres in forest reserves in the two States have been reserved as a wood lot for the benefit of the remainder of the Nation. Come out and see the great natural resources that are going to be developed and utilized through the instrumentality of the water power bill that we passed in the last Congress.

In the Columbia River Basin we have one-third of the potential 60,000,000 horsepower of this Nation, and we invite you out there to see those great water powers within 150 miles of Portland; to see the water powers of the Cascade Locks, 400,000 potential horsepower; The Dalles, 800,000 potential horsepower; on the Deschutes River, 500,000 potential horsepower; at the Umatilla Rapids, 320,000 potential horsepower. We are inviting you to come to our western country, where the Government has reserved millions of acres of land, and where it has reserved these great water powers. I invite you out there to see those scenes.

See once those stately scenes, then roam no more;
No more remains on earth to cultured eyes;
The cataract comes down, a broken roar,
The palisades defy approach, and rise
Green moss'd and dripping to the clouded skies.
The canyon thunders with its full of foam
And calls loud-mouth'd, and all the land defies;
The mounts make fellowship and dwell at home
In snowy brotherhood beneath their purpled dome.

[Applause.]

We invite you to Oregon, to the Pacific coast, and to Portland, the Rose City, in 1925. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for one minute.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, California adds her heartiest approval to this proposition for an exposition in 1925 at Portland, Oreg. The California Legislature has indorsed the proposition, and various chambers of commerce throughout the State have added their approval. Personally I think it would be worth $500,000 alone for the Members of this House to visit the great outdoors west of the Rocky Mountains. It would make bigger and broader men of many of you, and you would not hereafter quibble over a proposition of indorsing an exposition of this kind, wherein the whole American people are to be enlightened and the world given an opportunity to see what we are doing in the expansion of our great electrical and hydroelectrical resources. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] recited the sums of money which the Federal Government has appropriated for the various expositions, but he did not tell the House how much the people of the States and of the cities in which those expositions were held had themselves contributed to these national enterprises. The Philadelphia exposition was in commemoration of the establishment of this Republic. [Applause.] While the Federal Government contributed $2,183,000, the people of Pennsylvania and of Philadelphia contributed $5,300,000. [Applause.] The World's Fair at Chicago was a national enterprise in commemoration of the discovery of this continent, and while the National Government contributed $5,800,000, the people of Chicago and of Illinois contributed $13,800,000. [Applause.] The exposition at St. Louis was in commemoration of the Louisiana Purchase, a national undertaking, and while the National Government contributed $11,000,000, the people of Missouri and the people of St. Louis also contributed $11,000,000. [Applause.]

It is idle, Mr. Chairman, to argue that the National Government is giving, out of its generosity or out of its charity, aid to these enterprises. These expositions are for the upbuilding of the Nation; they are for the improvement of the whole country; they are for the expansion of the business and commerce and industry of the entire United States. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Tennessee desire that I yield further time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman can yield to me three minutes, I shall be glad.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House it is provided that when a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, or the previous question, and to postpone for a day certain. That is four of them, and it is provided that those shall be taken up in the order named; that is, that they shall have preference in the order named.

What I really desire to do, what I would like to do, is to move to postpone the consideration of this resolution until the 8th day of December, 1921. That will be Thursday after the meeting of the first regular session of this Congress. That is not done for the purpose of delay or of defeat. If I wanted to defeat it, of course, I could move to lay it on the table, or I could move to postpone it indefinitely, if I had the opportunity, and I could take the floor away from the gentleman from Massachusetts now to move to lay it on the table, but I do not desire to do that. If the previous question is voted down, I shall move to postpone the consideration of this matter until that day, and I think it ought to be postponed.

This is a pretty serious thing that we have to deal with in the light of world conditions. It is a matter widely published that there is to be a conference here some time in this coming autumn vitally more important to the world than the matter of an exposition. [Applause.]

I think we ought to defer the consideration of this matter pending that great conference. The interests of this great community are not going to suffer by the postponement of it until that time. I do not wish to move to lay it on the table. I am not going to claim the right to make that preferential motion. The next preferential motion in order would be for the previous question, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] will make that. I simply wish to say that if the previous question is voted down, then I shall move to postpone. If the previous question is not voted down and this matter is to progress to a vote, why then we will see what will happen.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of the House very briefly just what this resolution does, because I think the Members who have listened to the debate and who have not read the few lines of the resolution might easily be misled. There is an express proviso that the United States Government shall be put to no expense by reason of the extending of the invitation. Now, it may be that at some future time the United States will be asked to appropriate for an exhibit at this exposition. If we are, then if the fiscal condition of the Government warrants it, I hope that invitation will be accepted at the proper time; but that is one or two or three or four years hence, and it is entirely open to the Congress of that day and time to determine whether that appropriation shall be made. This simply starts the machinery going so that the exposition authorities themselves may make plans concerning the scope and size and importance of this exposition. We have been assured by the authors of this resolution in the Senate and House that there will be no request for a direct appropriation in aid of the fair itself; and, as far as I am concerned, I shall oppose any such appropriation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume that the object of this invitation to other nations is to induce them to have exhibits at this exposition, is it not?

Mr. ROGERS. That is precisely it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the United States Government officially invites the other nations of the earth to have exhibits at this fair, does it not create a sort of moral obligation on the part of the United States to do the same, whether we do it now or not?

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the United States Government will be liberal in accepting similar invitations relating to world-wide affairs. I believe it is good for the United States and for the world that we should do that. [Applause.] I believe it is an excellent expenditure of the public money, and as some one has said here, I think the money we have spent for world affairs in the past has been well spent. But, be that as it may, that question is not presented in this resolution to-day. It will not be presented to this Congress. It will be presented, perhaps, to some future Congress, to be decided in the light of the facts as they then exist.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 92, noes 27.

Accordingly the previous question was ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 26, noes 101.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 111, noes 16.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, because there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 197, noes 29, answered "present" 5, not voting 199, as follows:

 Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, and I therefore answered "present." If it were not for the pair, I would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
 On motion of Mr. ROGERS a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent the following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. BOIES, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.
 To Mr. HAMMER, until Friday, July 29, on account of the meeting of the North Carolina Press Association.

To Mr. GOODYKOONTZ, for one week, on account of public business.

To Mr. DOUGHTON, for three weeks, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5651. An act providing for a preliminary examination of the Yazoo River, Miss., with a view to the control of its floods.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 28, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

197. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting request for the repeal of section 1481 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regarding the retirement of naval officers, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DRIVER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6863) granting to certain claimants the preference right to purchase unappropriated public lands in the State of Arkansas, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 298), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7109) to accept the cession by the State of Arkansas of exclusive jurisdiction over a tract of land within the Hot Springs National Park, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 299), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7290) to confirm private-land claim of the widow and heirs of Joseph Etier, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 297), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. PORTER: A bill (H. R. 7975) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Norwegian Government for the detention of three subjects of Norway in Hudson County, N. J.; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FRENCH: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 180) extending the provisions of the act of February 25, 1919, allowing credit for military service during the War with Germany on homestead entries, and of public resolution 29, approved February 14, 1920, allowing a preferred right of entry for at least 60 days after the date of opening in connection with lands opened or restored to entry to citizens of the United States who served with the allied armies during the World War; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GOODYKOONTZ: Resolution (H. Res. 162) providing for the authorization of the building of public highways and for the relief of laboring men; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. DYER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, urging Congress to provide a plan whereby the money received as interest on loans made by this Government to other nations shall be converted into a fund to be paid to ex-service men of the late war, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KAHN: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of California, relative to an expression of confidence on the part of the California Legislature in the integrity and ability of Gen. Alvaro Obregon as President of the Republic of Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 28, 1921.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, July 27, 1921.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 5) authorizing the President to invite foreign nations to take part in an exposition at Portland, Oreg., in 1925.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 5651) providing for a preliminary examination of the Yazoo River, Miss., with a view to the control of its floods, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

AMERICAN TROOPS IN GERMANY (S. DOC. NO. 56).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of War, which was read, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 26, 1921.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution No. 114, directing the Secretary of War to advise the Senate of the number of United States troops in Europe, the cost of maintaining them, and the amount of indebtedness of Germany to the United States on their account, by direction of the President I transmit to you the following information:

1. The number of troops which the United States now has in Europe:

Commissioned officers	480
Warrant officers	20
Army Nurse Corps	54
Enlisted men	13,241
Aggregate	13,795

The above figures are taken from reports of June 30, 1921, the latest available.

2. The total cost for keeping these troops in Europe from December 18, 1918, to April 30, 1921 (the latest data available), has been $275,324,192.18, or an average of $966,049.80 per month.

3. On April 30, 1921, the balance due the United States by Germany was $240,744,511.89.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

REPUBLIC OF HAITI AND THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to the provisions of Senate resolution 112, the Chair appoints Mr. McCORMICK, Mr. KNOX, Mr. ODDIE, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. KING, the committee to inquire into the occupation and administration of the territories of the Republic of Haiti and the Dominican Republic by the forces of the United States.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON READJUSTMENT OF SERVICE PAY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to the provisions of section 13 of the act approved May 18, 1920, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," the Chair appoints Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. NEWBERRY, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. WALSH of Montana, as the members on the part of the Senate of the special committee to investigate and report to Congress relative to the readjustment of the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the several services mentioned in that act.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIS presented the memorial of G. W. Schwab and sundry other citizens of New Philadelphia, Dover, and Leesville, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation making stringent regulations for the observance of Sunday in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of Zebal Lodge of Perfection No. 5, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, of Lawrence, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation providing adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPENCER presented 21 petitions of Charity Grace and 29 others; Robert W. Bira and 29 others; John F. W. Dammann and 29 others; Edwin M. Schaefer and 29 others; James P. Doyle and 29 others; Mrs. Mamie Weisman and 29 others; Mrs. S. B. Kenney and 29 others; Elizabeth Duffey and 29 others; M. C. Kinsella and 29 others; Nicholas Remmas and 29 others; Theodore Schrech, jr., and 29 others; Mrs. Julia Ryan and 29 others; Jessie Glessman and 29 others; Benjamin McCabe and 29 others; Edward Lee Martin and 29 others; Patrick F. Dallard and 29 others; Lawrence D. McCann and 29 others; Mary F. Jackson and 29 others; Emil Scharlott and 29 others; Bertha Steinmeyer and 29 others; and Katherine Kenney and 29 others; all of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the recognition of the republic of Ireland by the Government of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted at the annual picnic of the American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic, held at Normandy Grove, St. Louis, Mo., July 17, 1921, favoring the recognition of the republic of Ireland by the Government of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KENDRICK presented petitions of sundry citizens of Thermopolis and Basin, Wyo., praying for the repeal of section 628-A of the revenue act of 1918, providing for a 10 per cent sales tax on manufacturers of carbonated beverages in closed containers, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2324) granting a pension to Joseph Vermilyea; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2325) granting an increase of pension to John H. Smith; and

A bill (S. 2326) granting an increase of pension to William H. Howell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 2327) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to investigate the extension of a patent issued to Earnest W. Ladd, Hunter Arnold, William H. Rohrer, Harry L. Wheatley, B. M. Quinn, and Thomas J. Farrar; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2328) for the relief of Margaret I. Varnum; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2329) granting a pension to Katherine E. Murphy (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHIPPS:

A bill (S. 2330) to extend the time for payment of grazing fees for the use of national forests during the calendar year 1921; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. KING (by request):

A bill (S. 2331) to lay duties, imposts, and excises, to raise revenues for the operation of the Government, and for the payment of the public debt; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) authorizing the United States Spruce Production Corporation to impose certain conditions on the sale of its railroad in Clallam County, State of Washington; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ASSISTANT IN SENATE DOCUMENT ROOM.

Mr. CALDER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 118), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint an assistant in the Senate document room to take the position that was omitted in the present legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 3, 1921, at the rate of compensation provided for this position in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved May 29, 1920; to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to submit an amendment to the pending bill—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. And to make a statement of not to exceed three minutes in length explaining my amendment to the pending bill and to ask that the same may be printed?

My amendment proposes to cure an obvious and unfortunate defect in the so-called Federal farm loan act. It will be remembered by all Senators who have investigated the legislation, or who took part in its enactment, that it was the intention of Congress, expressed on the floor of the Senate and the House, and expressed by the Secretary of the Interior, that the Federal farm loan law should and would apply to lands under Government reclamation projects; but the interpretation which has been placed upon the Federal farm loan act so operates as to preclude any farmer or landowner from participating in the benefits of the Federal farm loan law or obtaining loans thereunder, because the act of June 17, 1902, and the acts supplemental thereto, known as the reclamation laws, provide, in effect, that the charges for construction and maintenance of a reclamation project shall be a first lien upon the lands so reclaimed and receiving water; and the Federal farm loan law requires that the money loaned under the Federal farm loan law shall also create a first lien on the irrigated lands, whereas obviously there could not be two first liens; that is to say, the Government charges for constructing and maintaining the irrigation project could not be a first lien and the loan to the farmer, made under the Federal farm loan law be a first lien also on the same lands at the same time.

My amendment simply proposes that, for the purposes of the Federal farm loan law, the lien held by the Government of the United States for construction and maintenance charges of a Government irrigation project shall not be deemed as a lien paramount or superior to the lien on the same land created or placed thereon when the landowner or water user under the irrigation project secures a loan from the Government under the Federal farm loan law. In short, as the law now stands it is impossible for landowners or water users under the Government reclamation projects to obtain any benefit from the Federal farm loan law. In other words, I do not believe the charges for constructing a project under the reclamation laws should preclude a loan from the Government under the Federal farm loan act.

The reclamation of the arid lands of the West is an epic and an epoch in the history of this hemisphere.

The Reclamation Service is now supplying abundant water to 2,000,000 acres; that is to say, 2,000,000 acres are now receiving all their water from the Government projects, and 1,000,000 acres more are receiving a supplemental supply from Government projects, so I may say that within 19 years the reclamation law has transformed 3,000,000 acres of land, worth 19 years ago probably $5 per acre, into 3,000,000 acres of land worth now, about as follows: One million acres of it at $400 an acre, present value, and 2,000,000 acres of it present value $100 an acre, or a total valuation now of $600,000,000. In other words, the transmutation has turned 3,000,000 acres of land worth $5 per acre, or $15,000,000, into land now worth $600,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me finish my statement. On these reclaimed lands $90,000,000 worth of crops are grown annually. Five hundred thousand people are housed or homed or find employment on the Government reclamation projects. Fifty thousand homes have been built, and since the reclamation law took effect $400,000,000 worth of crops, not counting live stock or stock products, but crops alone, have been raised, and yet people who own the land or obtain water from the reclamation projects are not permitted to participate in the benefits of the Federal farm loan law.

I hope the Senate will agree either to my amendment or some other amendment that will cure the defect in the Federal farm loan laws. I have no pride of expression, certainly no pride of opinion; but if the Senate wishes, as I know it does wish, to aid the farmer, let it amend the Federal farm loan law so that those who live under reclamation projects and have lands may secure a loan.

I must close. I am admonished by the clock that I must stop. My three minutes have expired.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me just for a correction?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not desire to yield for discussion of a different subject than that which I am about to discuss.

Mr. FERNALD. This is just a correction of a statement, which I am sure the Senator will permit.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, Mr. President, I yield the floor and when the Senators get through then I will try to get it again.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, in making his statement the Senator from Arizona said 3,000,000 acres of land would be worth $150,000,000. He should have said $15,000,000.

Mr. ASHURST. No; I mean 3,000,000 acres of land are now worth $600,000,000. They were previously worth $15,000,000.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator said $150,000,000.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from Maine for the correction.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator wish to propound a question to me?

Mr. NORRIS. No; but I should like to finish the remarks that I began on yesterday.

Mr. ASHURST. I know when a speech is bottled up in a Senator how tyrannical that speech is and how it fizzes and clamors for expression and I sympathize with my friend, but he can do no greater service for the people of the country, and he has done great services for his country, for he is an ideal Senator, industrious, superb, with intelligence of a high order, but he never can in his career do a greater service for his country than to champion my amendment, which will permit the farmers under the reclamation projects to obtain loans from the Government, as the law intends.

I ask that the amendment be printed and placed upon the desks of Senators to-morrow morning.

I thank the Senator from Nebraska for yielding to me.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Arizona to introduce an amendment. I am not finding fault with his amendment, but I hardly think I ought to be expected to yield for a Senator to make a speech on a different subject than that which I am discussing. I wish to yield to Senators, and I shall always do so, but I hope they will not take advantage of my yielding to proceed to make a speech on free silver or something of that kind, or some other amendment that I am not discussing.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to ask—

Mr. NORRIS. I do not yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask to have a letter printed in the Record in connection with my remarks. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona to insert in the Record a letter as a part of his remarks?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., July 12, 1921.

HON. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ASHURST: We, the undersigned citizens under the Salt River Valley project, holding lands to which we have received patent, since the 9th day of August, 1912, under which patent the Government expressly retains a lien for construction charges, feel that we are unjustly discriminated against by the refusal of the Farm Loan Board to allow us to participate in the benefits of the farm loan act.

We appreciate your efforts and the action of the Farm Loan Board in placing all the other lands under the project under the benefits of this act, and feel that it was a step in the right direction for the relief of the farming interests in this community, but we would urgently request that you do all in your power to hasten the legislation now pending before Congress designed to clear up all uncertainties in reference to the lands which are entitled to the benefits under this act, and to authorize lands having against them a construction charge to participate in the benefits of the act.

We feel sure that you will realize the justness of our claim, when at least 75 per cent of the lands under this project are entitled to loans, but the other 25 per cent, which are in identical condition, so far as liability for construction charges are concerned, are deprived of this benefit.

If you would use your influence with the Farm Loan Board in reference to getting this discrimination removed and allow us to participate in the benefits of this act the same as all other lands in the project, we would appreciate it as a personal favor.

Thanking you for your former courtesies, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

J. C. DOBBINS.
C. L. WAGONER.
WM. WETZLER.
WM. J. MORGAN.

ALLAN WILKINSON,
Honorary Secretary, R. F. D. 5, Phoenix.

Mr. NORRIS resumed the speech begun by him yesterday. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McNARY. On behalf of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to make an inquiry. A few days ago, when it was desired to get the Kellogg substitute printed and in the hands of Senators as quickly as possible, I think some arrangement was made for its immediate printing—an emergency printing. Can not that same arrangement be made with reference to this substitute? I am very anxious myself to see it.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that it is the hope of the committee that it may be printed at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the clerks at the desk that the substitute will be printed and back here within perhaps two hours.

Mr. NORRIS resumed and concluded his speech, which is entire, as follows:

Wednesday, July 27, 1921.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to analyze—to some extent, at least—the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. Before I do that I desire to say that I have no criticism to offer against any Senator or any other man who thinks the committee bill is wrong, who is opposed to any legislation on the subject. Those who object to any legislation—and there are many of them, honest and able men, both in the Senate and out—may be right. I think that the condition of the producers of our country is such that we are warranted in legislating in a way that we would not think of doing under ordinary circumstances. I may be wrong and the committee may be wrong.

So that I am not finding fault with any Senator who says that the action we propose to take through the bill that we have reported to the Senate is too radical or will not bring relief. We thought it would when we reported it, although no one believed that it would be a cure-all for all the evils that exist now, even in agriculture.

I am not finding fault with any Senator who prefers the substitute. I recognize his privilege, which I freely grant. Yet, Mr. President, before I commence an analysis of the substitute I want to talk just a little about the method by which it reached the Senate. It is no secret that the administration is now and always has been against the legislation proposed by the committee, and that is a right those who compose the administration have, and I am not criticizing them on that score. But no one has denied and no one dare deny but that the Committee on Agriculture, recognizing the difficult situation, were acting in the best of faith, trying faithfully and earnestly to produce some remedy for the deplorable condition of agriculture.

We had hearings, extending over about 10 days. It was quite apparent when Mr. Hoover appeared on the stand and when Mr. Meyer appeared on the stand, both of whom were invited by the committee to come, that they were opposed to this legislation. They were very courteous in their opposition. But it was not long after that bill had been reported and had been taken up and made the unfinished business of the Senate before it became apparent that Congress was going to pass some kind of a bill on the subject, and it was not long before the opposition was shrouded—to a considerable extent, at least—in mystery. We all knew that those close to the administration were opposed to the bill, and little by little it leaked out that there was going to be a substitute bill drafted.

The program was not disclosed to the Committee on Agriculture. No suggestion of such a procedure was made by Mr. Meyer or Mr. Hoover, who are two of the principal moving spirits, representing not only themselves but somebody else higher up, against this legislation; and yet it became apparent that somewhere in the Capital City there was a powerful influence working against this legislation, and that we would probably be confronted with some kind of a bill in opposition to the one the committee had reported.

There were two things necessary in framing that substitute and getting it ready. Those who were behind it did not want anything except probably a bill to turn some Federal funds over to the railroads, and so it became a question of how little they could put in the substitute and get by with, and that accounts for all the negotiations and the buttonholing that went on for several days prior to the introduction of this substitute.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment I will yield. There were two classes of Senators who it was apparent might be gotten. One was composed of the cotton men of the South, Democrats; the other branch of Senators who might be induced to get in the administration band wagon was composed of Republicans who wanted to be stamped with the indelible stamp of regularity.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know whether the Senator knows, but it is not true that I am opposed to any legislation. I have been in favor of legislation from the beginning and have done everything possible to aid the farmers. I differ with the Senator from Nebraska as to the means. He may be wrong, or he may be right; but I have not opposed legislation of any kind looking to the benefit of the farmer now or at any other time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator reminds me of a man whom the sheriff once undertook to arrest. There had been a murder—maybe for the purpose of the illustration I should not say "a murder"—there had been a horse stolen in the community and the sheriff walked up to a man and put his hand on his shoulder, and immediately the man said, "I didn't steal that horse," and the sheriff said, "I had no idea that you did. I have no warrant for your arrest. You have never been charged with the crime, and if there is any suspicion that you ever stole the horse it has come out just now."

I did not say the Senator from Minnesota was opposed to the legislation. I have not charged him with being unfriendly to the farmer. He says he wants to do anything to help the farmer, and if he will let me proceed I am going to show how he was selected, because he was a friend of the farmer, to father this mysterious bill that all at once came into the light.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator said those who favored the substitute wanted to beat any legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. LENROOT. Did not the Senator say that those behind this substitute did not want anything except to get money for the railroads? I have taken the Senator's language down.

Mr. NORRIS. If I said that as to those behind this substitute, that is what I meant. I do not put the Senator from Wisconsin behind it. I have not put the Senator from Minnesota behind it. I have not put anybody in the Senate behind it. It did not originate in the Senate. Its father is not here. It came from other places, and those who finally came to the conclusion—and they are powerful—that we are going to have legislation on this subject did not want any legislation on it, and they are getting just as little of it as they possibly can, and when they come to carry out their wish then they have to work with Senators.

Some Senators are opposed to any legislation, and I have the utmost respect for them. I have no intention of criticizing them, as I said before, and they have a perfect right to be opposed to it, and they may be right, too. I think they are wrong, but I respect their opinions and their judgment just as much as I would like to have mine respected, although I do not always have it respected.

Now, let me see, Mr. President, where was I when I was diverted? I believe I was talking about these two sources from which this opposition would be gathered; that is, in addition to those who were opposed to any legislation whatever.

So they started out to frame a substitute bill. I shall talk about the cotton men first, then I will take the Republicans up afterwards. Did it ever occur to you that they paved the way to get the cotton men by resorting to a sort of psychology? They wanted to make an atmosphere that would be pleasing to the cotton men, and the War Finance Corporation commenced all at once to issue bulletins. I have a large number of them in my hand, issued daily, practically daily bulletins. They had not been doing much. We had rejuvenated them, but there was not much indication of life. They became busy all at once, and their industry, their energy, their time, and their efforts were confined to cotton, and every day they issued a bulletin to the effect, "Yesterday we financed this man's cotton and that man's cotton," and so on, and the next day another one.

It was not long before the cotton men began to see that the War Finance Corporation was their friend, and you had to break up what appeared to be a combination, but what was a natural coalition of the agricultural interests, which included cotton, corn, live stock, and wheat. That was the method by which the way was paved to approach the cotton men, and they became interested, naturally, in the financing of cotton. Their hearts were opened up to the messengers, self-appointed or otherwise, who might buttonhole Senators and talk about what legislation could be had, and would be put through, and the War Finance Corporation resurrected itself almost out of the grave in its activities to save the cotton situation. It was a good thing, I think. So, no matter what may happen, this legislation did some good for the cotton men. Thus the way has been paved to take the cotton men away from the bill. We will see when the roll is called how many have succumbed, and it will be quite a number.

On the other hand, there were Republicans who would rather be with the administration and be a regular than to be almost anything else. The same means that are always used by the political powers and machines, whether it is under a Democratic President or a Republican President, were brought to bear to bring into line for administration measures the fellows who were standing out on the edges and who were probably watching the plum tree, and who did not want to be edged away from the pie counter, and who would hate worse than anything else to be labeled as irregular or irreconcilable or insurgent.

Now, it became necessary to put something in here, to take something out there. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in his very able address this afternoon, has told of suggestions that he made, and he found, when the substitute got here, that it had them in. He was a most enthusiastic supporter of the committee bill a few days ago, but the suggestions which he made went in, and suggestions from fellows on this side went in or in some cases went out.

As I said originally, and, of course, I have had to get my information in various ways, some of it I can prove and some of it, I think, is a fair conclusion from things that are apparent, the substitute first had in it a provision for the loaning of money to the railroads. It does not have it in now. They did not take it out because they wanted to, but because they found there were Senators whose support they needed, which they could not get if it had that provision in it, and so at the eleventh hour they took it out, and it does not appear now. It probably will not show up again until after this combination succeeds in displacing the committee bill with the proposed substitute that is brought in here, and then it will probably be offered as an amendment, and possibly if it is found dangerous to offer it then, it will come in as a separate bill.

Why, Mr. President, when we had the bonus bill here and when it was pending before the Senate the President appeared and made an argument against it and immediately Senators who had voted to take it up voted to send it back to the committee. It worked. It had its effect. The end was accomplished. Whether it is good or bad I am not now arguing, but the administration had its way. We heard, to begin with, that the President was going to appear again, because he had been so successful on that bill, and make a speech on this bill. It was finally determined that he would send a written message to avoid the criticism of coming up here and debating questions that were in the Senate or for fear, probably, that the Senate might ask the President to submit to the Senate rules and be questioned when he undertook to debate questions that were immediately pending. So the President sent a message. We all remember that message, as it was read yesterday. It told of the necessity of loaning some money to the railroads. Now, that message was undoubtedly written when that provision was in the substitute bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. Although at the last moment the substitute had to be changed to keep some Senators in line, the President forgot to change his message and let it come just as he had it before.

I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was just going to suggest to the Senator that there was one paragraph about the necessities of agriculture, and the remainder of the message about the necessities of the railroads.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Of course, if he had struck out what he said about the railroads, there would not have been enough left to make a message, and it would not have looked well to send up only a sentence on the pending bill.

During all this time the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had been investigating the subject in the best faith. When we reported the bill we said, "We invite criticism. Amend the bill if it is not right. We are laying our cards on the table, face up. We have nothing to conceal. We are out in the open and have been from the beginning. We think the bill will help. If, after debate, the majority of the Senate can change it and make it better, we welcome it."

But this mysterious force that was going around to make up the substitute bill never came out in the open. The Senator from North Carolina to-day came nearest to telling a couple of the people who were behind it. He said the administration had nothing to do with it. Of course, the administration will be delighted with the defense which the Senator from North Carolina made for it. That means, as I take it, from what the Senator said, that the administration never came to see the Senator. He told us who did. He made suggestions, but no one who knows anything about it, no man in the Senate has any doubt that Mr. Meyer had consultations at the other end of the Avenue as well as in the Senate Office Building at this end. No one thinks otherwise.

It would be just the same, if we relieved the power behind them from having anything to do with it, to say that Mr. Meyer had nothing to do with it, who the Senator says actually prepared it. I presume it was written by a young lady on the typewriter. We might find out who she was and just put the whole blame on her, and say that she wrote it, she prepared it, and relieve everybody else. To talk about a couple of men, Meyer and the other man named by the Senator and whom he eulogized so much—both of them probably entitled to every word of praise that he uttered—and to say that they prepared the substitute bill, it seems to me is to say what every Senator must understand to be an erroneous statement, at least. I have no doubt, and if you will give me compulsory attendance of witnesses I think I can prove it, that many a consultation was had about the bill in the White House. I suppose there was always a guard on the door for fear somebody might find it out. Whether it was a consultation in the darkness of the cellar of the White House or in the inaccessible recesses of the attic of the War Finance Corporation's habitation, there were many, many of them, participated in by many, many men, high and low, in and out of office, outside of the Senate.

I do not believe one could find in the history of the Senate of the United States an instance where this kind of procedure has been carried on. The committee, while it was conceded that they might be fools, were at least honest and were doing the best they could, but it was entirely kept from them. Where was the place to go if they wanted to correct this proposition?

Two of the men who had a great deal to do with this, Hoover and Meyer, had been before the committee, after the Secretary of the Treasury had been invited to come before the committee, and I ought to say, because some man will criticize me if I do not, that I do not blame him for not coming, because he had another appointment, so he said, and I have no doubt it is true, and was not able to come; but he was invited, at least.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. Why was it that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the beginning to the end of this mysterious and secret method was never taken into consultation in any way?

I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee how often and under what circumstances the Secretary of the Treasury was invited to appear before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. NORRIS. The Secretary was asked to appear.

Mr. McNARY. Under what circumstances, and what opportunity did he have? Was he asked more than once?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. McNARY. Was not the suggestion brought to the attention of the chairman to call him?

Mr. NORRIS. I know that he was invited only once. I never was instructed to invite him the second time and I never did invite him again. If that is a sin, I will bear it right on my own shoulders.

Mr. McNARY. Is it not usual for the chairman to transmit bills that affect certain departments, that require departmental exercise of discretion, and ask their opinion on matters of that kind?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it would be usual to send to the Secretary of the Treasury such a bill as this. If the Senator himself, who was a member of that committee, thought it ought to be done, why did he not do his duty and ask that that be done? I would have been very glad to have done it if anybody had asked it. It never occurred to me that that ought to be done.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the chairman of the committee that on two different occasions I made the request that the Secretary of the Treasury be invited, and the chairman of the committee will recall the answer that he made the first time.

Mr. NORRIS. I invited him, I will say that to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Perhaps it was in response to the second request.

Mr. NORRIS. Maybe it was the second.

Mr. McNARY. At the time of the first request he did not approve the action.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not care to have him. Of course, I knew what Secretary Mellon would say. Is there anybody here who did not know? Is there anybody here who would accuse

Mr. Mellon—and I say it in perfect respect to him; he has lived that kind of life, he has looked through those glasses from the time he got out of the cradle, big business, big money, trusts, banks—is there anyone here who would not know now without hearing Mellon that Mellon was against the bill? I said then that he was against it. And, let me repeat, he had a perfect right to be against it. I knew he would be against it. I knew that when I introduced the bill. I did not ask him whether I might introduce it or whether he would be for it. If the Senator from Oregon wanted to prepare a bill would he go to Secretary Mellon if it were something about agriculture and ask him whether he might introduce it?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. The fact that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry believed that the Secretary of the Treasury would be against the bill is no good reason why any reason he had in fundamental objection to that class of legislation should not be laid before the committee at a public committee hearing?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not get the Senator's question yet.

Mr. EDGE. I will try to repeat it and make it clear.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. EDGE. If the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry felt, as he expressed himself, that the Secretary of the Treasury would fundamentally be against that type of legislation, is that any reason why he, as a very important officer of the Government, should not be called before the committee to give his views, even though they were contrary to the legislation?

Mr. NORRIS. None whatever. There is no dispute about these facts. I said then what I say now, only a great deal more briefly. I simply said that I knew Secretary Mellon would be against the legislation. I did not care to ask him to come; I would not have asked him to come. When the suggestion was made I acquiesced in it. There was no vote concerning it. I did not object to it; I did not demand a vote on it. I made the request, and invited him to come. I concede that a man who is against a measure has just the same right to appear against it as those who favor it; but it is not the business of those who favor legislation to hunt up fellows to come and fight it. If that is a sin, I am guilty, and I am ready to take the responsibility now and here. I did not ask him to come until I was requested to do so. I repeat, there was not any vote on it in committee, but it was merely acquiesced in, and he was invited to come.

I would say the same thing about Hoover. Who got any light from Hoover's testimony before the committee? I invited Hoover at the suggestion of the committee. We had other people there; anybody who was suggested we invited to come before the committee.

Of course, I was laboring under the impression at that time that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] was favorable to the legislation. If any Senator, on the committee or otherwise, had appeared there or had seen me personally and asked that somebody be summoned to come, I would have asked him to come. I knew of some who were favorable to the legislation when they came before the committee, and I knew of some who were opposed to the legislation when they came; but I invited men at the request of others to come before the committee, without knowing whether they were for the legislation or against it. I did not try to cover up anything; nobody did. From questions which are asked, however, it now seems to be a sin because when Mr. Mellon could not come the day he was asked that I did not invite him to come some other day. The Senator from Oregon, if he had been at the meeting of the committee, could have made the request and secured Mr. Mellon's attendance.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I will state again that I think the chairman of the committee expressed indifference; perhaps, he desired not to have either Mr. Mellon or Mr. Meyer, upon the theory that, as he understood, those men would be against this character of legislation in the form proposed; but I still insist that it would have been wise to have had both those gentlemen before the committee. As it was, however, we had Mr. Meyer and Mr. Hoover, but not Mr. Mellon.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, we had Mr. Meyer; we had Mr. Hoover; and we had Mr. Fisher, who was against the legislation, a Wall Street man. We also had the Secretary of Agriculture before us; and it seems to me that he was the man to invite to be heard upon this kind of legislation, and was the person to whom the legislation ought to be referred. I can not now say whether I sent him a copy of the bill or not, but I think I did. However, whether I did or not, whatever penalty applies to the case I am willing to stand for it; and the Senator from Oregon can take it up either here or in the committee and see what kind of punishment he can mete out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee. It is rather unfortunate to use the phrase "meting out punishment" to the chairman because we disagree over the character and purposes of a bill. It is not a question of punishment; it is a question of having the truth developed. That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, if the Senator is satisfied with the truth, I am sure I am.

Now, I will go on and tell some more things that I believe to be true. I am a little at a loss to know where I was when I was diverted. I believe, however, I was speaking about the message of the President and how he had written it at a time when he thought he could get through a different kind of bill.

Mr. President, the bill was finally gotten together; the child was born; but it was illegitimate; it had no parents. The administration had to hunt up somebody to father it. It would not do to take the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], who had made an argument somewhat along the line of the substitute; that would not be strategy, because the Senator from New Jersey comes from a manufacturing State; there is not very much farming in that State.

The Senator from New Jersey thinks there is, perhaps, but the farmers know there is not; there is a little gardening there, and that is about all. Those who had brought this mysterious child into the world wanted an agriculturist, a farmer from a real farming community to be its father, and bring it in to the christening. So they looked over the country, and they said, "Here is Minnesota, a great agricultural State. It will help to some extent if we can get some one from a State like that to father the bill." It just happened that the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] was likewise well qualified for the task—a farmer, a horny-fisted son of toil. He would be just the man, if he would do it. He was always doing something for the farmer, being a real farmer himself—a scientific farmer, with a large library of farming books. In his library you would find Washburn on Real Property—all farmers have real property; Parsons on Contracts—all farmers make contracts; Bishop's Criminal Law—all farmers are liable to commit crimes. Then, probably, you would find a morocco-bound volume entitled "The Relation of Golf to Chicken Raising"; and if you would look a little further along in that great farmer's library you might find another volume entitled "Hoyle on Other Games." So, the Senator from Minnesota was selected to be the godfather of this child. It had to be christened. Nobody had yet seen it, except a few favored wet nurses who were there when it was actually born. The Senate Agricultural Committee had not seen it; the Senate had not observed it; it was desired to bring it into the Senate and to have it properly christened according to ancient form.

Now, it just happened—and it was probably something which had been thought of—that it might not be possible for the Senator from Minnesota to secure the floor at once. I think it is a bad practice, but sometimes Senators see the Presiding Officer and tell him they want to be recognized, and we have known sometimes that there is a list up there on the throne, and Senators are recognized according to the list, although it is in violation of the rules of the Senate.

It just happened—it was only an accident—that a member of the Agricultural Committee wanted to speak on the pending bill. Of course, I am not defending a member of the Agricultural Committee who wanted to speak on this bill that came from that committee. That may be an offense, and therefore I will not mention the Senator's name; but he did want to address the Senate on the bill. So he saw the Vice President and communicated his wish that, being a member of the Agricultural Committee, he thought he would like to be recognized to speak upon this agricultural bill.

The Vice President did not come in when the Senate convened. He was not far away; he came in a few minutes afterwards and occupied the chair; but what usually happens in the morning when the Vice President comes in and calls the Senate to order did not happen on this occasion. Of course, it might have been due to accident; he might have been caught under his automobile out here and not been able to get out from under in time; but when 12 o'clock arrived the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] walked in and called the Senate to order. After the Senator from Minnesota had started the Vice President walked in, a little late, and took his place on the throne where he now sits.

If this incident went no further we might not be able to draw conclusions; but the fact that the Vice President came in so soon afterwards at least demonstrates that he was not very far away; and the fact that a member of the committee had indicated a wish to him that he be recognized when the Senate convened to speak on this bill and that the Vice President was away just long enough for somebody else to occupy the chair and until he could recognize some other Senator makes it look as though the coming in of the Senator from Kansas was not an accident.

But that is not all. The Senator from Kansas walked upon the platform and called the Senate to order, and, without looking in the direction where the Senator from Minnesota stood, recognized the Senator from Minnesota, who had not yet addressed the Chair.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not going to discuss in the Senate the insinuations and sneers of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator had better sit down.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will not sit down until I finish the statement.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, if he goes too far, will sit down unless he disregards the rules of the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say that I arose at 12 o'clock, as I had notified the chairman of the Agricultural Committee that I desired to do, asked the recognition of the Chair, and was recognized. I went to the Senator's room, and told him what I proposed to do, and said that I should like to offer the substitute and make some remarks upon it at 12 o'clock, as the Senator knows.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that all the Senator has to say about it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That does not refute what I have asserted; and I happen to know what occurred, because I know a Senator on the committee who had requested recognition. I was watching it, because I told that Senator that the Senator from Minnesota had come to the committee room—and that is the first notice we had of this christening that was to take place, or of the existence of the child that was going to be christened—about 11.30, just before the convening of the Senate, and told me that he was going to offer a substitute at 12 o'clock; and when he told me that, although he did not even then give to me or to the committee a copy of this new bill that he was going to propose, I told the member of the committee who had previously told me he was going to speak, and had already seen the Vice President about it, to be on his feet and to be ready, because unless he was he probably would not get recognition. Therefore, I was watching the situation, and I want to say now that the truth is that the Senator from Minnesota was recognized before he addressed the Chair.

Mr. KELLOGG. That, Mr. President, is a mistake. It is not so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is not a mistake. I will concede that the Senator may think otherwise. The Senator was standing on his feet, and did address the Chair after the Chair had said, "The Senator from Minnesota," and I was watching it in the place where I am now, able to see both the Senator from Minnesota and the Chair within my vision; and the Senator from Kansas rapped on the desk, and the first words that he uttered were, "The Senator from Minnesota," and the Senator from Minnesota then said, "Mr. President."

I am not saying that the Senator from Minnesota is practicing any deception whatever. I know he is mistaken about it. He knew what he was going to do, and undoubtedly the man in the chair knew what he was going to do. There is no doubt about that; but the Chair was too quick for the Senator from Minnesota. If you have a difficult job to put over at any time and you want a man with the necessary courage that can do it without a blink or a wink, get the Senator from Kansas. He put it across so quickly that the Senator from Minnesota did not have time to catch his breath. If there had been a machine here taking down what was said, you would not have found even the length of a comma between the rap of the gavel and the voice of the Presiding Officer saying, "The Senator from Minnesota." It was all one.

That is a little thing in itself, Mr. President, but it only shows how carefully every detail is looked after when this great political machine is going to put something over. Forget nothing, and if a Vice President has possibly made some arrangement that conflicts with it, push him aside and put another man in the chair who is not bound by the agreement. And so, Mr. President, the foster father of this poor child comes into the Senate and exhibits it before us.

Now, let us brush aside these velvet and silken clothes in which this young thing is dressed and ascertain whether it is a thing of flesh and blood and has real life, or whether after all it is a rag baby, a dry piece of clay, inanimate and dead. Let me say in all candor about it that I think it has some life. I would rather have it than have no bill at all. It is better than nothing. It would, in my judgment, accomplish a great deal of good; but a fundamental difference between it and the committee bill is that while the committee bill provides for a corporation that shall be the link between the producer and the consumer, this new bill, with a halo of regularity about it, provides nothing for the producer. It does not consider him at all. He is left out entirely. The bill deals with bankers, with middlemen, with trust companies, and confers all its favors upon them. All of their machinery must be oiled and paid for by the producer or the consumer, or both.

Now let me take up this substitute. Let us see what it means.

The very first thing after the introductory part it says:

Whenever the board of directors of the corporation—

That is, the War Finance Corporation—

shall be of the opinion that conditions arising out of the war, or out of the disruption of foreign trade created by the war, have resulted in or may result in an abnormal surplus accumulation of any staple agricultural product of the United States which is normally exported in substantial quantities and that the ordinary banking facilities are inadequate to enable producers or dealers in such products to carry them until they can be exported—

All those things must exist first, in the opinion of the board. When they are of the opinion that conditions arising out of the war or the disruption of foreign trade created by the war interfere with these things they can operate. They have a discretion that the proposed law does not attempt to take away—a discretion not as to securities, not as to time, but a discretion as to whether agricultural conditions are bad; and there is not an agricultural man on the board. The Secretary of Agriculture is not there. It is composed of Mr. Mellon, Mr. Meyer, and these other fellows, like the man from North Carolina, whose name I have forgotten. As the Senator from North Carolina in praising him said, he is the biggest farmer in North Carolina, the biggest manufacturer in North Carolina, and the greatest lawyer in North Carolina; so he is some man, to be sure, with all those accomplishments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not said he was the greatest lawyer in North Carolina or the greatest manufacturer in North Carolina.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that he was a large manufacturer and a successful one; that he was a large farmer and a successful one; that he was a large banker and a successful one; that he had built a railroad, and that he was one of the most prominent lawyers in the State, with a lucrative practice.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I accept that. That is a good deal better than what I said. That is one of the fellows who is going to decide whether, in his opinion, there is something wrong with agriculture. I am casting no aspersion upon the Senator's friend. I concede all that he said about him. I say nothing against these men.

Mr. SIMMONS. All I want to say to the Senator is that if he knew how much that man had lost in agriculture last year he would know that that man sympathizes with other farmers.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably he does. I did not say he did not sympathize with them; but we are going to leave this discretion entirely to people who are not agriculturists in the main. I know and you know and God knows what kind of a farmer it is who is practicing law. We know how his hands are all blistered from following the plow. We know the farmer who is running a lot of banks or the farmer who is one of the biggest manufacturers in some of the textile industries in North Carolina. We know how sore his feet are from driving the cows home from pasture. We know that he suffers awfully in the work of agriculture; and, of course, we know also as to these other men, great and good and holy as they are in their several occupations and followings, about how much they have to do with agriculture. They may own a lot of farms and have a lot of fellows working for them. Almost all of them do, as a kind of a pastime. They can tell you a great deal about a game of golf, but they do not know very much about the milking of a cow or the setting of an old hen. They do not know much about farming, and the troubles and the trials and the tribulations of the real toiler on the farm are unknown to them. Now, they may be much better than the farmer for all that, but they do not know what the farmer has to contend with. They can not know. They must get it all second hand; and it is to that kind of a board, before they can do anything under this substitute, that we will leave the discretion and let them decide to begin with whether agriculture is hard up or whether it is otherwise. That is the discretion we leave to them in the beginning.

Let us see how many ways they could have to get out of doing anything.

They may be of the opinion that the farmer is starving to death, but that the conditions did not arise on account of one of these enumerated reasons, and if they are, they will not have any right to do anything for him.

They may think that this disruption of the foreign trade was not a result of the war, and if they do, they can not do anything under this act.

They may think that while it was caused by the war, or was a disruption brought about as a result of war, there was no abnormal surplus; and if they think that, they can not do anything for the farmer.

They may think that the product concerned was not in other years normally exported in substantial quantities; and if they do, they can not do anything under this bill.

They may think that the farmer does have the ordinary banking facilities; and if they do, this bill is of no account. They can not do anything.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Returning to the review of the personnel of the board, the Senator's original bill, as I remember, called for the appointment of the Secretary of Agriculture and two citizens to be appointed by the President; did it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator assume that when two men are to be appointed by the President to handle purely a banking proposition with a capital of $100,000,000 and with the right to issue bonds to a total of $1,000,000,000, any administrative officer having the responsibility of appointment would not attempt to find a combination of men who knew the agricultural situation and who also knew how to conduct a very large banking institution?

Mr. NORRIS. Again the Senator is putting a straw man up to knock him down. I have not said that there ought not to be a man on this board who understands banking. I think there ought to be a man who understands foreign securities. I have not made that suggestion. But I have said that on this board that exists now there is no farmer, and there is nobody who represents agriculture. The committee bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be chairman of the board.

Mr. EDGE. I understood the Senator to criticize the gentleman from North Carolina, whose name I do not recall, who was described by the Senator from North Carolina to be a very large farmer in that State.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but I did not criticize the gentleman from North Carolina, and I do not criticize the other members of this board. I have the very highest regard for them. But if I wanted a man to milk cows I would not hire the Senator from New Jersey to do it.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is correct in his analysis.

Mr. NORRIS. I would expect him to make a complete failure of it, although probably to run a bank with a billion dollars he would be just the man to take; and when we have here an agricultural proposition, admittedly an agricultural proposition, together with others, it is true we ought to have somebody who is an agriculturist or represents agriculture fairly on the board. A lawyer who has a farm can not qualify as a farmer. I have an idea that the Senator from New Jersey has a farm.

Mr. EDGE. I am not that wealthy. I can not stand the expense of such a luxury.

Mr. NORRIS. It does take a good deal of money to stand the luxury, if you go into the farming business, and you would find it would take a good deal of money to operate it correctly, and more brains than it would to run a bank or to practice law, and do it successfully and correctly. Farming is going to be one of the most scientific things in the world. The farmer of the future is going to be a chemist; he is going to be the best educated man there is, and he ought to be to make the highest success of agriculture.

So, Mr. President, I want to repeat that I am not criticizing, and it seems to be necessary to repeat it, because even Senators seem to think that I am criticizing somebody when I say that this proposition ought not to be left to Secretary Mellon and to Mr. Meyer and a lawyer down in North Carolina.

The man who runs a law office, or the man who runs a bank, or the capitalist who does not actually toil in the fields can not comprehend the farmer's problems; he does not know them.

When he pays a big price for beefsteak he blames it on the farmer, who has not gotten enough out of the steer out of which the beefsteak was taken to pay for the corn that was fed to the steer the last three months of its life. He has not comprehended the farmer's problems, and these men are going to decide for the farmer, first, whether the farmer is hard up; second, whether the condition that made him hard up was brought about by the war; third, whether the farmer has sufficient banking facilities; and if he has, then they are going to let him alone and let him work out his own problem.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very sure the Senator wishes to accurately state the contents of this substitute, and the limitations he now refers to apply only to the export business or to agricultural products held until they can be exported. Those limitations do not apply to section 24 and subsequent sections.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator is correct in that—they do not apply to section 24, because section 24 is not an export proposition. Before I finish I will analyze section 24. I am only going to pause here long enough to say that I think that section 24 is a good provision. As a member of the committee which reported the other bill, if the Senator from North Carolina had taken section 24 right out of this en bloc without a change and offered it as an amendment to the bill I would not have objected to it myself.

But these discretions I have been talking about apply to the exportation proposition, and while the Senator from North Carolina thinks section 24 is the most important I do not agree with him at all on that. I think the great question to solve in connection with this is the question of exportation. It is more a question of getting a market than anything else, although the other question is an important one, I concede.

So, Senators, when you are looking at this substitute, to start with, think of the improbability of it ever having any effect whatever when it is left to men who, great as they may be, do not realize the farmers' problems, and that is just the condition this bill would bring about. In my judgment we could stop right at the point I have reached, and reasonably conclude that if we pass this substitute all up to section 24 will never be effective.

The War Finance Corporation did not do very much until we commenced to agitate, until the pending bill got to a dangerous place, where they thought it might pass, and when it is over with and the storm is passed whatever bill gets through, if any, I have an idea they will probably rest again, as they did before.

They can not understand the farmers' problems. This War Finance Corporation does not understand the farmers' problems. Among these bulletins they have been issuing there is just one that tells about wheat, and that tells about collecting some money for a sale of wheat that was made in Belgium during the war. But they did not buy that wheat of the farmer. I would not be surprised if many of these men on this board would not know a field of wheat if they saw one. They do not know how it is gathered by the farmer, and how it is turned into flour. I have an idea that some of them do not know whether it grows like a potato, in the ground, or is picked off a tree, like an apple; and without any disrespect to them, Senators, are we going to leave to men who have no knowledge of farming the question as to whether farmers shall be relieved or not?

They might be able to pass on one of these questions very well, whether the farmer has sufficient banking facilities. They must find that the farmer is suffering, that agriculture is down. They must find, next, that it is a result of the war, or a result of the disruption of things caused by the war; that the products are produced in abnormal quantities and can not be exported in normal quantities; that under ordinary circumstances in the past they have been exported; and that the farmer has no banking facilities. They must find all those things first under this sacred substitute.

I ought to pause right there, before I go on with the substitute, to say that if I brought in a proposition like this and asked the Senate to pass it, on an important question of this kind, it would be objected to, and very properly. Senators would say, "This ought to go to a committee of the Senate. It ought to be thrashed out." That would be a very proper objection. But it does not apply to something that has a sacred birth like this holy of holies. It does not apply to this wandering child, whose parentage is fostered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. That has not been considered by a committee, but the Senate is asked to swallow it at one gulp.

Mr. President, if this had been sent to a committee of which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], let us say, had been a member, knowing him as I do, I know that one of the first things he would have pointed out would have been these provisions I have already called to the Senate's attention. They are similar to the "whereases" of a resolution.

Here is a board that has not a farmer on it, or within sight of it, that is going to say whether there is a condition of hardship among the agriculturists of this country; they are going to pass on it. They are going to pass on all those other propositions before the law can become effective, and we are going to pass the substitute without ever having referred it to a committee or without it ever having been considered by a committee.

I have been criticized here to-day by a member of the Committee on Agriculture because I did not invite Secretary Mellon the second time to come to the committee meeting. Suppose I said here now, "Have you invited Secretary Mellon to consider this substitute?" It would probably be answered in the affirmative, because I have an idea that he had a good deal to do with its preparation. But why does it not apply to their bill as well as to ours? Why is not the sauce that is good for the goose good for the gander also? Why is it that you apply one rule to the Committee on Agriculture and do not apply the same rule to this secret combination of Senators and outside parties? Why can from some unseen source a bill on an important subject like this be dropped, as it were, through the skylight and the Senate be asked to pass it? Why is it that anybody must be criticized if they object to the procedure?

The other bill had to run the gauntlet; it did run the gauntlet. This substitute has just emerged in a bright, new dress, right out of the sacred chamber of an unknown bunch of fellows, unnamed, and the Senate is asked to pass it without hearing anybody, even Mr. Mellon.

Of course, everybody knows that Mellon knows all about this bill, and so does Hoover, and they both approve it, probably not because they like it but because it is what they have decided is the least they will have to give to kill the committee bill.

I wish that Senators would take the criticism that has been made during this discussion, applied to the bill which the committee reported, and apply it to this substitute. I am going to do it before I finish, and I am going to show that the sins that have been charged against the committee bill are quadrupled in the substitute bill.

Practically every criticism that has been made in the several days, more than a week, of discussion here in the Senate against the committee bill can be applied with double force to this substitute bill.

[At this point Mr. NORRIS yielded the floor for the day.]

Thursday, July 28, 1921.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when the Senate took a recess yesterday I had reached the point in my remarks where I had begun an analysis of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. Indeed, I had taken up one section of it and analyzed it somewhat. The first section of the amendment, which I have analyzed, lays down a certain state of facts that must be found to exist before the War Finance Corporation can take any action under the proposed bill unless it be with the exception probably that was called to my attention yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], section 24, which is an independent proposition which I shall discuss later.

I do not know how long this particular provision that I have been discussing was in the proposed substitute or how often, if at any time, it has been changed during the various processes of its incubation. I understand, however, that there was a time in the life of the proposed substitute that it contained a provision that the War Finance Corporation, to carry out its provisions, included the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, but that he was eliminated because it was feared that might bring about some opposition here. I am not sure whether he was eliminated out of regard for the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], or from some other cause, but at least he does not appear in the document now.

Personally, I have no particular objection to Mr. Hoover being in, but if we are going to get an Englishman to look after the agriculturists of America I would prefer the Prince of Wales.

I understand he is an excellent player of the game of cricket, and that game has to be played out upon the soil, and he perhaps gets somewhat acquainted with the questions that pertain to the soil.

Now, the members of the War Finance Corporation, whose only knowledge of agriculture has perhaps been acquired in their tedious trudging over the golf links, before they can use any of the funds for the purpose of helping agriculture, must find that the conditions arising out of the war or out of the disruption of foreign trade created by the war have resulted in or may result in an abnormal surplus accumulation of any staple agricultural product of the United States which is normally exported in substantial quantities, or they must find that the ordinary banking facilities are inadequate to enable the producers of or the dealers in such products to carry them until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner. They have a complete discretion as to all questions pertaining to agriculture. If they find that certain conditions exist, then what can they do? What is the next step after they have made their finding? After these farmers, who have viewed the crops from the twentieth story of a building in Wall Street, have decided that the farmer does not have good banking facilities or that he has a surplus of products that are ordinarily exported, and that there ought to be more of them exported if their discretion in all these questions finally decides in favor of the farmer, then they can take some steps. What are they? In that case they shall—

Be empowered to make advances for periods not exceeding one year from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine.

They can make advances to whom?

(a) To any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in the United States in dealing in or marketing any such products, for the purpose of assisting such person, firm, corporation, or association to carry such products until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner.

Observe that they can only make advances to corporations, firms, persons, or associations "dealing in or marketing any such products, for the purpose of assisting such person, firm, corporation, or association to carry such products." They can make no advances to the producer, but make them to the middleman, the speculator. The man who buys of the producer is the man they take care of; he is the man who may be accommodated under the proposed substitute by the loaning of money so that he may hold the products. The producer has lost title to them; perhaps the producer sold them when prices were depressed. The middleman has acquired title, and he acquired it just as cheaply as he could.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. But when he acquires the products for the purpose of holding them he can get advances from the War Finance Corporation through the fund which is to be provided. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the Senator from Nebraska if under his bill any advances may be made to anybody to carry domestic products? Under his bill advances can only be made for export.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; such advances may be made. The bill as originally drawn provided that the farmers' export financing corporation might even buy such products, but an amendment has been suggested by the committee and will be pending to eliminate that provision from the bill. I am going to take up the committee bill before I get through and show what the differences are between it and the substitute proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me at that point?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he knows of a single grower of grain in the United States who is himself an exporter of such grain?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is now being organized among the wheat producers of the country a cooperative organization for the purpose of eliminating the middleman and carrying their products from the farmer to the consumer. The committee bill would take care of that kind of a proposition and would eliminate the middleman.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether under the terms of his bill as originally drawn it would take care of anybody except such a cooperative association?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Would it not be necessary for the grower of grain also to be an exporter in order to receive the benefit of the bill so far as advances are concerned?

Mr. NORRIS. The growers' cooperative organizations are going to be exporters. They are organizing for the purpose of exporting.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask the Senator whether anybody except cooperative associations could receive advances?

Mr. NORRIS. They will, if the organization is perfected. That was in mind when the committee bill was originally drafted. If the organization is perfected, the producers are going to export their own products; it is to be an association of producers, which nowhere in this substitute has any standing whatever. Nobody but the middleman, nobody but the speculator, nobody but the man who has bought the product from the producer and who wants to hold it for higher prices can get any of the money proposed to be advanced under the substitute.

Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. LENROOT, and Mr. BURSUM addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to all three Senators at once.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Nebraska know that the War Finance Corporation has already arranged to advance $5,000,000 to the Cotton Cooperative Association?

Mr. NORRIS. I have a number of bulletins to which I referred on yesterday, and the Senator from New Mexico now has one in his hand, I think.

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the way that this unseen power has been able to get a good many votes in order to vote down the committee bill and to vote up the substitute.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to try to solve the problem now confronting us by any exhibition of feeling, of prejudice, or of antagonism of any kind toward anyone. Whether the ideas which come into the Senate come from any unseen source or wherever they may come from, we have a very delicate situation throughout the country. We want to solve it, and do so according to the facts.

Mr. NORRIS. We have only one thing to do, and that is to follow when this unseen force or any other power injects a bill into the Senate in an irregular way. We find, however, that they have not done anything for the producer.

They have surrounded the corporation with a lot of discretions that will enable them arbitrarily to deny to anyone, on their ipse dixit, any support whatever and without any reason by simply saying "We believe you have sufficient banking facilities now and we will not help you." But when they do help the producer is cut out.

Has it come to this, Mr. President, that because a bill comes in that I do not think is right, no matter from what source it comes, I am precluded from calling attention to what I believe to be its bad features? I think this is one of them.

Mr. BURSUM. Not at all, Mr. President; in fact, I think that everyone gives great credit to the Senator from Nebraska for his devotion, his activity, his earnestness, and his desire to do something to relieve the situation. It does not necessarily follow, however, that we should treat with antagonism any other proposal that may be brought forth, no matter what its source may be. Each bill must stand on its own bottom and be judged according to the facts. There is nothing to be gained by stirring up prejudice against the administration of the War Finance Corporation. I come from a producing section, and I happen to know that not so very long ago arrangements were made by which the War Finance Corporation would make advances to live-stock growers. I happen to know—and the record will verify the statement—that thousands of loans were made to live-stock producers, and that the administration of the War Finance Corporation was conducted in behalf of the public interest and in behalf of the live-stock industry.

The War Finance Corporation has functioned well. I have great faith in its management. I believe that Mr. Meyer, who is the managing director, is a "live wire" and has at heart the prosperity and success of this country. I believe that the matters alluded to in the bill with reference to abnormal conditions on account of the war are the prime reasons why we should at this time pass the character of legislation proposed. If we had normal times, it probably would not be necessary. I believe further that we must assume that any act which Congress may pass will be administered in the best of good faith; it will be administered as intended by the Congress, and that the construction placed upon it will be liberal and will coincide with the administration of other matters which the War Finance Corporation has hitherto had in charge.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not, as did the Senator from Arizona, make a speech in my time. I desire to be courteous to Senators, but the Senator from New Mexico is going to have plenty of time to argue this question.

Mr. BURSUM. If I have unduly infringed, I ask the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not done that, but he must realize that if every Senator, as two of them have already done this morning, shall occupy a considerable portion of my time I will not be through within a week. I will yield for questions and suggestions, and I want to be liberal about it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I am up against the proposition that I have a 15-minute speech to answer, and two other Senators are on their feet. I will ask them to wait until I answer the Senator from New Mexico, and then I will yield to them.

Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from New Mexico is all right; I am not finding fault with it; but it is strange that I have to repeat the statement that I have not anything against the men who compose the War Finance Corporation. Senators may call them saints, if they desire, and I will admit that they are. I have no objection to any of them. Senators may call them great and good men, and I will agree with them; but they are not farmers. We have an agricultural proposition to settle, however, and it is proposed to turn it over to Wall Street and let them settle it.

Mr. BURSUM. Is there anything that would prevent the managing director of the War Finance Corporation cooperating with the Secretary of Agriculture? Could he not summon to his aid all of the information possessed by the Government with reference to agriculture?

Mr. NORRIS. There is not a thing in the world to prevent it.

Mr. BURSUM. Is there any reason to doubt that he will do so?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, he will not do so.

Mr. BURSUM. He has done so.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, he will not do so; nobody expects him to do so.

Mr. BURSUM. He did so in reference to cotton.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not do so, and the Senator would not do so. Is there any reason why on the board, or whatever it may be called, there should not be some man who knows something about agriculture? Senators stand up here and say that these men love the farmers. Perhaps they do; I believe they do; I never disputed that; but they have all their lives looked through Wall Street glasses, and do not know what the burden is that is resting upon and bending the farmer to the earth now. They do not know anything about it, honest and great and good though they may be.

I am claiming, this being an agricultural proposition, that there ought to be somebody to handle it who knows something about agriculture. When I say the members of the War Finance Corporation do not know about agriculture, then I am called to order because I am intimating, it is said, that they are not friendly to agriculture. I do not mean that, as I have repeated a dozen times. It is admitted that there is not anybody on the War Finance Corporation who has anything to do with agriculture. If we were proposing to pass a law here relating to the officers of national banks, and it was proposed that the law should be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, what would the Senator say? What would I say, and what would anybody else say?

If I should propose such a thing as that, the Senator could criticize me, and then I would answer him as he has answered me: "Why, do you not suppose the Secretary of Agriculture wants the banks to be all right? Do you not believe he would call the Secretary of the Treasury into consultation with him when he was taking action on a bank?"

Mr. BURSUM. That is exactly what he would do.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course he would; but the Senator would not for a moment contend that he ought to be the man to carry out the national banking act; neither would anybody else. You might just as well say, "Why, we ought to abolish the Secretary of Agriculture, and let Mr. Mellon be Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. BURSUM. You have a practical live-stock man on that board, Mr. McLean. I happen to know that Mr. McLean is very well versed in cattle and in sheep. He knows more about those things than almost any man that I know of.

Mr. NORRIS. There are very few people who know that Mr. McLean is on the board.

Mr. BURSUM. He is one of the board, however.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but you have not heard of him in all of these bulletins or in all of this discussion.

Mr. BURSUM. The live-stock men heard of him when they were making applications for loans.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Meyer is the board; the Secretary of the Treasury is the board. They are running the operations; and the live-stock man probably, if you found out about him, would be like the farmer from North Carolina, a big banker, a railroad man, having a controlling interest in some of the largest textile manufacturing institutions in the State, and above it all the greatest lawyer in the State; but he owns some farms, and therefore he is a farmer.

Mr. BURSUM. What is the difference between a live-stock grower who becomes a banker and a banker who becomes a live-stock grower?

Mr. NORRIS. One is just the reverse of the other, if that has anything to do with this discussion. One commences at one end and goes to the other, and the other fellow commences at the opposite end and comes up to the place where the other one started. I do not know that that has anything to do with it, however.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am not going to trespass on the Senator; but I yielded to everyone who wished to ask me a question, and I hope the Senator will do the same thing.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator stated, as I understood, that the measure offered by me did not propose to loan any money to anyone except the dealer and the middleman, and cited a farm organization or association as an instance. If the Senator will refer to subdivision (a), of section 1, he will see that the corporation is empowered to loan "to any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in the United States in dealing in or marketing any such products." That would include any farm organization, and has already included them in loans. If the Senator will turn to the original act, section 21, he will find that we have not reenacted that in the proposed amendment, because that includes for export loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in business. If the Senator wishes to include producers, I have not the slightest objection. He knows, of course, that no corporation is going to be able to loan directly to all the producers in the country; but I have no objection to it. If the Senator wants the Secretary of Agriculture on this board, I have not the slightest objection to that, so far as my individual opinion is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that. This board undoubtedly never will loan to individual producers, unless they might be extremely large, of course. I realize that the board can not go out and loan to every farmer; but I also realize that there are associations of producers in some of the States that have more farm products of their own that they have produced than any individual dealing in them in the same State owns at any one time.

Mr. KELLOGG. This is intended to cover them, and I believe does cover them.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it does.

Mr. KELLOGG. And if it does not cover them, if anybody will suggest any broader language, I am willing to put it in.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will look at the committee bill, he will find some broader language.

The Senator from Wisconsin interrupted me, and I now yield further to him.

Mr. LENROOT. Right along the same line, I asked the Senator whether under his bill advances could be made to any producer of agricultural products unless he was also an exporter. The Senator replied: "Probably not," but added that cooperative associations were now being formed to engage in the export business. I again call the Senator's attention to his bill, which provides that the person to whom the loan is made must be a producer of agricultural products and also an exporter. Unless this cooperative association does produce agricultural products as an association, under the Senator's bill advances can not be made. Under the substitute bill advances may be made to such a cooperative association if engaged in exporting but not under the Senator's bill.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I think the Senator is wrong about that. The word "person" is defined by the committee bill and is defined to include associations. There is not any question but that they are included. There never was any question raised before in regard to their inclusion. It was the intention of the committee to include them. I think we have included them. I have not any doubt of it; and I will say again that if these Senators were so anxious to get the producer in, and he was not in, they have certainly gone a good way astray in drafting a bill that does not use the word; and if that was left out of the bill they might very easily have had it put in by a simple amendment. It would not have been necessary to go through all this performance for the last week to get an entire substitute to get the producer in. It was the producer that the committee had in mind when they framed their bill. It is the producer that I am contending for now, as against the middleman. We wanted to eliminate the middleman, and I think the bill which the committee reported would have enabled the organized producers of agricultural products in this country to carry their own products from the farm to the markets in foreign countries. If the operation of the bill had been successful and the time came for it to go out of operation, as it does by its own terms, there is not any doubt, if it had been a success—and I think it would have been—that these producers themselves would have taken the very machinery that the bill set up temporarily and would have made it permanent, and they would have had to a great extent a permanent elimination of the middleman.

After all, Mr. President, that is one of the great causes of the high cost of living. Between the producer and the consumer there is a gulf, inhabited mostly by millionaires and profiteers. I do not condemn them all now. I do not condemn any of them, as a matter of fact. I do not blame any of them for making all they can out of it, and some middlemen are going to be necessary; but I think every man who will give the matter fair consideration will agree that all the agencies that can be eliminated between the producer and the consumer ought to be eliminated, not only for the benefit of the producer but for the benefit of the consumer as well; and that includes everybody in the country.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator admit that under his bill no producer can receive advances unless that producer is either an exporter or a member of a cooperative association that is an exporter?

Mr. NORRIS. I never had an idea that a producer, an ordinary individual farmer, was going to get a direct loan under the bill. I do not think that is contemplated by anybody. I do not suppose the Senator contemplates that by this amendment. This corporation, no matter what it might be or how it might be constituted, would not be able to advance money to all the individual farmers of the country. I am not asking that. I am not claiming that. I do not want that, although even if the law goes far enough to give them the authority to do that, it might be, when you have to make a law general, that it would include a good many people who under the practice of carrying it out would be in effect excluded.

Mr. LENROOT. Then does the Senator admit that the only producers who could receive advances under this bill would be members of a cooperative association?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not admit that.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator explain, both in explaining his own bill and in attacking the substitute, what producers will receive the benefit under his theory, and how they will receive it?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am going to do that when I get to it. I am discussing now the particular provision in the substitute bill that provides for the advancing of money to the middlemen, to the agents, to the exporters.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If the cooperative association is engaged in exporting, is it not entitled to advances under the substitute?

Mr. NORRIS. That might be true under the language I have read; but why do you cover it up with doubt? Why do you not say in your bill that you are going to provide for cooperative organizations, instead of drawing a complete bill that has gone up and down the Avenue for several days, for weeks, and no one of all these farmers' friends anywhere has thought of the word "producer," or thought of a cooperative organization of producers?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will answer that question. His bill describes the persons who can be aided as follows:

"Person" includes partnerships, corporations, and associations, as well as individuals.

Of course, "persons" includes individuals, anyway.

The proposed bill, in subdivision (a), uses exactly the same words—

Person, firm, corporation, or association.

And the original act included the same language. Now, will the Senator show me any difference?

Mr. NORRIS. What are these corporations, associations, and persons doing, though, under the substitute bill? Let us read a little further. They are dealing in or marketing such products. They are dealers; they are exporters—they are middlemen, in other words. That is what these corporations are doing.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator admits that under his bill they must be the same.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's argument, then, comes down to this: This substitute is just the same as the original bill, and all the sins of that bill were paraded before the public, in the Senate, and by a great many of the newspapers. It was criticized as putting the Government into business and providing for its buying farm products and hoarding them. Now, in order to set up the virtues of the Senator's substitute, he argues that it is just the same as the other bill. What is it here for, then? What business has it here? What standing has it here? What is the object of it?

The committee bill was criticized because it would enable the corporation set up by it to buy farm products and hoard them, or would enable the producers to hoard them and keep them off the market, and thereby increase the price. It was said that when the corporation got these products together and hoarded them it could hold them until a hungry world, frenzied and mad with hunger, would be compelled to pay fabulous prices to get its food. That was the picture that went from San Francisco to New York in the newspapers that were condemning the bill. That was the picture that was set up here on the floor of the Senate. The bill was condemned because it was a hoarding proposition; and I concede that under the provision of the original bill if the corporation had disregarded all the rights of the people and had violated the very reason for its existence that might have occurred. But what does the substitute say?

Hoarding is condemned under the committee bill. It is a virtue in the substitute. The only difference is that under the committee bill the hoarding, if it took place, would be by the producers of the country—by this corporation representing the producers and the consumers also.

Under the substitute, if hoarding takes place, it is by the middlemen; it is by the speculators. Just let me read a little part of this very clause I have been discussing. What can they advance the money to these speculators for? "To carry such products until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner."

I am not condemning that, Senators, and I am not objecting to that provision. I think there ought to be an instrumentality, whether it is provided for in this bill or any other, by which a reasonable amount of loans can be made, and it is in that regard that I think there are some provisions in the substitute that are good.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. Let me get one paragraph ended, and then I will yield to the Senator. What I am criticizing is that the same fellows who are backing up this substitute, which admittedly permits hoarding, condemn the committee bill because they claim it permits hoarding. This reads, "until they can be exported." Under the committee bill they buy them and hold them. Under the substitute they loan money upon them to the speculator and let him hold them. That is the difference.

I am not afraid of that provision in this clause of the substitute. Let me repeat, I am not condemning it because there is a possibility of evil in it. There is also a possibility of good, and if these men do their duty it can be practically worked out so that it will be a benefit and not an evil. I want Senators to get the point. I am calling attention to the fact that what is a vice in the bill which came in from the Committee on Agriculture, under which there might be a possibility of the same thing, is a virtue when this unknown child sticks its head up here on the floor of the Senate.

Now I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BURSUM. Does not the Senator from Nebraska believe that under the authority granted in section 24—

Mr. NORRIS. I will not yield now for a question as to that section.

Mr. BURSUM (continuing). Ample facilities will be provided—

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator ought to recognize that I have the floor and that he can not interrupt me without my consent. He is asking me a question about section 24. In due time I will come to that. But please do not ask me a question about section 24 until I get to it, and I will yield to the Senator to ask his question when I get to it. I do not want to jump from the front of the bill to the back of it, and section 24 is the tail of the bill, and I am talking about the first of it.

Mr. BURSUM. Reference having been made by the Senator—

Mr. NORRIS. All right; if the gentleman persists, let him go ahead and ask his question about section 24. If I can not prevail on him to be courteous enough to wait, let him ask it now.

Mr. BURSUM. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator very much. Now, I will refer to another thing the corporation can do. I have just enumerated what they can do under paragraph (a), and one class of people they can advance money to. Under subdivision (b) they can advance, "To any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which makes or has made an advance or advances to any person, firm, corporation, or association as is described in paragraph (a)." In other words, this money can be used not only to loan to a speculator himself, but after they have loaned it to him, and he has borrowed some more money from a bank, they can loan money to the bank which made that loan—to a banker again, allow me to emphasize, or a trust company, a middleman, not to any association of producers. This is a banker's bill, and while I am not contending that there should not be loans made to bankers and even the middlemen, I recognize that in this substitute bill there is but one class of fellows who can be accommodated. There is no provision in it under which anything can be done for agriculturists without a rake-off to somebody, a banker, or a dealer, or a speculator.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator says "not to any association of producers." Is there not included in the language in that subdivision before the Senator's eyes the word "association," and does not the word "association" include producers in the substitute if it does in the committee bill? The word is identically the same.

Mr. NORRIS. Again the Senator eulogizes his substitute because it is similar to the committee bill. That is worthy of note as we pass along. But I am reading paragraph (b), which provides that loans may be made to any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which has made a loan to any of the dealers or the speculators in the farmer's products. It is a loan to a banker, and nobody else. It is a loan to a middleman.

We were criticized and condemned and laughed at because we were going to use the money of this governmental corporation to help the producer and associations of producers, and now we are met with a substitute which says, in effect, "You shall not help the producer except through the instrumentality of the middlemen, the speculators, the bankers, and the loaning companies."

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. I submit that section 26 provides what a banker is and who can engage in these transactions. It says the word bank shall include any institution which is responsible. That may include a cooperative association.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us read it out of the bill.

Mr. BURSUM. "With resources adequate"—

Mr. NORRIS. I will read section 26. That will be better than the Senator's explanation, probably.

Mr. BURSUM. All right.

Mr. NORRIS. It reads:

Whenever in this act the words "bank, banker, or trust company" are used, they shall be deemed to include any reputable and responsible financing institution with resources adequate to the undertaking contemplated.

That makes it a little worse. The definition adds something to the banker. It will not only include a banker or a trust company, but it shall be deemed to include any reputable and responsible financing institution. Any corporation organized for the purpose of financing can get money under this. They are middlemen. That is not the producer. That is not an association of producers. It is another illustration of another middleman popping up his head here.

Mr. BURSUM. Is there anything to prevent a cooperative association from doing that very thing?

Mr. NORRIS. I never heard of a cooperative institution as such going into the financing business. We all know what that means. There are financing corporations in Wall Street, and that is about the only place in the United States, I think, where they exist.

Mr. BURSUM. How did the Cooperative Cotton Association finance?

Mr. NORRIS. The Cooperative Cotton Association is not a financing institution. They may have to borrow money.

Mr. BURSUM. They may become such.

Mr. NORRIS. Not unless they go into the business of loaning money to somebody else.

Mr. BURSUM. Not necessarily.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not mean that because somebody borrows money he is in the financing business. This refers to men and financing institutions loaning money to men and corporations, and the Senator can not by any legerdemain construe that into meaning a cooperative institution which itself has to borrow money. That does not make it a financing institution, and nobody will claim it.

The balance of paragraph (b) is:

The aggregate of advances made to any bank, banker, or trust company shall not exceed the amount remaining unpaid of the advances made by such bank, banker, or trust company for purposes herein described. Such advances shall bear interest at rates fixed by the corporation.

Now, let us take up the famous section 24, the one which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said was the best thing in the whole bill. I think he said that if everything else were stricken out, this would still be a good thing.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator may have discussed the proposition of the rate of interest under subdivision (a). Did the Senator do that?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not discuss the rate of interest.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator may have discussed the proposition of the rate of interest under subdivision (a). Did the Senator do that?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not discuss the rate of interest.

Mr. KENYON. What does the provision mean as to the rate of interest? It reads:

Any such advance shall bear interest at a rate of not less than 1 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. I have an idea that is a misprint.

Mr. KENYON. Under that there is no limitation. Interest could be charged at the rate of 10 per cent, or 20 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. KENYON. Is that a misprint?

Mr. KELLOGG. It was in the original War Finance Corporation act.

Mr. KENYON. Should there not be some maximum?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection.

Mr. KENYON. Should there not be a maximum limit, instead of a minimum?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection. It was in the original War Finance Corporation act, and there has been no change made.

Mr. KENYON. It seems to me a very peculiar provision.

Mr. KELLOGG. It may be peculiar, but it passed the Senate once, and it was simply put into this substitute without change from the original act.

Mr. KENYON. Some very peculiar things pass the Senate once in a while.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to a change being made in that.

Mr. NORRIS. I supposed that particular provision was simply a misprint.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not a misprint.

Mr. KENYON. It does not seem to be a misprint.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought it was only an error, which would be corrected.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I think I remember the purpose of inserting that in the original act, and I presume the same purpose existed for putting it in the substitute. In order to enable the War Finance Corporation to market its bonds, there must be adequate security, and therefore it was provided that the rate of interest should never be less than 1 per cent in excess of the rate of discount by the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a very proper provision, Mr. President. If it were not there, then they could bring an obligation back here from the Federal reserve bank and some other institution have to pay it, if it falls short of paying expenses.

Mr. KENYON. Then, should there not be a maximum limitation, too?

Mr. SMOOT. There is a maximum limitation.

Mr. KENYON. What is the maximum limitation in the law?

Mr. SMOOT. Six per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care to discuss that, but I think the Senator is wrong about that maximum limitation.

Mr. KENYON. I think he is, too; I do not think there is any limitation.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care much about it. Whatever the rate is, the farmer pays it in the end, and under this substitute he pays the rate that is fixed by the bank. The bank, of course, must have its profit. If it is through a speculator or a dealer, he must have his profit, and he must get enough out of the producer or the consumer to pay the interest which he has to pay for the accommodation and the extension; and if, in addition to the loan that is made to him, a loan is made likewise to a banker who has loaned to him, that is more added to it, and the farmer or the consumer foots the bill.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] thought a great deal of section 24, and I said to the Senator that I had no objection to section 24 being in the bill, but that I did not agree with him as to its importance. My own idea is, Mr. President, that if effect is given to section 24 so as to bring any appreciable relief to the agriculture of the country, it must likewise be done through the instrumentality of the middlemen. If any material relief comes, it will cost $20,000,000,000 to bring it about. If we are going to relieve the situation by buying notes and mortgages from banks and giving them the money for them, we are putting this institution in the banking business. Some little relief may come out of it; it must necessarily be small, because the magnitude of the situation, when you take into consideration all the banks of the country, is such that the money, a billion dollars, as provided in the substitute, would not be a drop in the bucket. There would not be any money left to do any of the other things provided for in the substitute. If this $1,000,000,000 were used in the State of North Carolina, it probably would not go around and relieve the banking situation.

While I am not objecting to the provision I think it almost useless. I do not believe much good can be accomplished through the instrumentality of section 24. It ought to be and it is a banking proposition. It ought to be a provision giving this authority to the Federal Reserve Board to relieve the situation by furnishing additional funds. They are equipped to do it, I think, but to allow it to be said that the War Finance Corporation shall have the privilege of performing the functions provided for in section 24 with this money means that if they do anything that amounts to anything that will do any good to anybody they will not have anything left to do anything anywhere else.

Before I read section 24 it just occurs to me, when I speak of the billion dollars provided for in the substitute, that I should compare that with the committee bill.

We were criticized most severely. I have papers and financial journals from the leading cities sent to me criticizing and condemning us and calling us crazy and everything else because we propose to authorize this corporation to issue bonds to the extent of a billion dollars. The committee changed the provision and reduced it to one-half, to $500,000,000. That is where it stands now under the committee amendment. They have authority to issue bonds amounting to five times the amount of their capital stock. The maximum of their capital stock is $100,000,000, so that under the committee amendment as it stands now there is a maximum of $600,000,000; and while it was almost a crime to suggest that to the Senate of the United States in the eyes of bankers and financial writers and even of Senators, here comes a substitute right out of the air, without hearings, at least in public, without consideration by a committee, swallowed down with one gulp like a drunken man would swallow a raw oyster, which provides $1,000,000,000. There is not a word of criticism from these same alleged financial experts. One difference is that the amount is twice what the committee bill proposes and another difference is that this billion dollars all goes through the hands of bankers and middlemen to enable them to get their rake-off.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator mean that that is the only difference in the proposition?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the one guaranteed by the Government and the other not?

Mr. NORRIS. I will take that up right now. The committee bill provides that its bonds shall be guaranteed by the Government. The substitute makes no guaranty. Every Senator knows and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], who argued against the committee bill, was honest and fair enough to admit on the floor of the Senate that he had no objection to that guaranty because the Government would be morally bound anyway.

The substitute bill provides as to the corporation that every dollar of stock is taken by the Government, and every officer of the corporation is a governmental official. It is provided that it can issue its bonds. To begin with, its capital stock furnished by the Government is $500,000,000 as against $100,000,000 provided for in the committee bill. Then it is provided that it can issue bonds to twice the amount of its capital stock. That means a billion dollars in addition to the $500,000,000 all furnished by the Government and all officered by Government officials.

Is there any man here, is there any man who will ever give any consideration to the proposition, who will not agree with the Senator from New Jersey that the Government is morally bound? I repeat, under the substitute bill, although technically it is not in the bill, the Government morally, rightfully, and honestly is just as much bound to pay every dollar of those bonds, every dollar of interest, as though it were stipulated in the bond. Is there a Senator who is going to say that he will vote to build up a governmental corporation, officered by our own officials, and then to say to the people on the strength of that governmental corporation if they buy these bonds and the corporation fails and there is a loss instead of a gain, that he as a Senator will not feel morally bound to pay every man every dollar that he loses? Why, Mr. President, morally there is no difference between the two propositions.

We laid our cards on the table, yours are concealed in the darkened room, but on that proposition they are just the same excepting the probability of loss. Under our bill there is only half the amount that can be involved, and therefore the loss can only be half as much as under your bill, and that is the difference. I confess that it makes me tired to hear the financial writers, the political leaders and their satellites here, condemning the one proposition where we are honest and say yes; we are going to be legally bound by that which we are morally bound, and then without a word of criticism take another proposition that will treble the liability and leave the possibilities of loss just three times as great.

But we have another advantage on that proposition. We want these bonds to float. They will float better with the Government guaranty than without it, and at a lower rate of interest. Everyone knows that. If the Government is going to lose in the end, it will lose less if we will guarantee it on its face and have a less amount of interest to pay than though we were only morally bound to make that good.

Let me repeat: The maximum of Government money that can be involved under the provisions of the committee bill is less than that involved in the substitute bill. In round numbers, it is only one-third as much. Now, Mr. President, I am not contending here that these men will lose the money. I do not believe they will do so under the provisions of either bill. I have more faith in your War Finance Corporation than you fellows have. I think they are going to do an honest business, no matter what bill is passed. I do not believe they will lose money in the aggregate. It may be they will make loans that it will take a good while to collect. I believe that will be true. It will be a good while before the money will come back.

Yet we can not, of course, close our eyes to the possibility of a total loss if the instrumentality provided for in the bill to carry the law into effect is faulty. If the men are all dishonest, if they lose this money at poker, if they throw it into the ocean, if they lose it all, we have lost it. Everybody must concede that under the provisions of either bill. I have an idea they will be as careful as they can. They will do business on business principles. They have the same powers that any private corporation has. They can sue, then can be sued; they can take real estate, if necessary, to protect themselves. They can do everything that an individual can do, the difference being that they have the great Government of the United States behind them.

Now, the question is presented whether it is a good policy to put the Government behind this proposition. That is the policy lying behind all of this kind of legislation, upon which wise and honest men may differ. We all agree, however, that there is a condition confronting us that is deplorable and which we must remedy. I think we can afford even to take some risk to remedy it. It is almost necessary, it seems to me, in order to prevent agricultural disaster, that something be done.

I am not afraid of that guaranty. I think it is the only honorable position to take. I am not willing to put the Government of the United States behind a proposition of this kind to induce citizens to subscribe their money where they have no voice in it whatever, where the Government itself through its officers operate it all, with any possibility of losing their money. We need that money. We ought to make it inviting for our people to invest their money. And we should both as a matter of honesty and economy make the investment in these bonds absolutely secure.

Since I am diverted from a discussion of section 24 to taking up another proposition, I am reminded of still another one which I will discuss right now. The committee bill has been criticized again and condemned severely because it is provided that the bonds to be issued by the corporation, amounting under the committee amendment to a maximum of $500,000,000, should have tax-exemption features, that they should be exempt from the surtax, and that $5,000 thereof held in the hands of any one individual should be exempt not only from the surtax, but the normal tax.

That provision has been criticized, and I realize that there is great ground for such criticism. I think we are justified in leaving that provision in the bill, but it has been severely criticized because we are partially exempting from taxation these bonds. It was criticized, I think, unreasonably, very severely, and everybody, especially myself, whose name happened to be connected with the bill was condemned as reactionary and, in some of the editorials that have been sent to me, as unpatriotic, by men moved by motives of demagoguery, men who were willing that their country should be ruined if they could get some political capital out of it.

That is the kind of argument that came to me and that is still coming every day, and yet here we are, with this holy of holies that has been dropped down from the sky upon us, that has in it the same thing except that it is covered and we can not see it, and not one of these fellows kicking about it. They object to exemption of these bonds, if the producer is going to get any benefit, but they have no word of protest against it if the middleman and the banker and the speculator will get something out of it. That is the difference.

The substitute bill does not say a word about exempting, but, like the traveling man's overcoat, it gets in there just the same. It revives the War Finance Corporation act. It extends it. It is under that extended act that the substitute comes into operation as an amendment; and in that act, carefully tucked away, is the identical language, word for word, that is in the committee bill as an exemption from taxation, absolutely no difference, exactly the same; so that although there is nothing on the face of the substitute bill itself the exemption from taxation is there just the same.

Again let me say that I do not mention that in the way of criticism. I am defending the proposition in the original committee bill. I believe that we were justified in so providing, although I do concede that there can be made against it a very good and a very logical argument. I would not stand for it; I would not be for it under normal conditions; but I am only calling attention again to the denunciation that has been made against those who supported the committee bill and who voted it out, after full discussion, into the light of day. I am calling attention of those who criticized it that the ground for that criticism exists as well in the substitute bill.

The provisions relative to exemption from taxation which are contained in the committee bill were taken, word for word, from the War Finance Corporation act. The only difference is that under the substitute bill there may be more bonds issued than under the committee bill; that is all; so there would be more bonds exempt under the substitute bill than there would be under the committee bill. In all honesty, Mr. President, in all fairness, I will say as to those who have been fighting the committee bill for the reasons that I have outlined—and I have only outlined them briefly—is it any wonder that those who are defending the committee bill should be indignant that the same things which are condemned in it are also contained in the substitute bill, but are covered up in it, and yet not a word of criticism of the substitute bill is heard on that account. That is holy; that is righteous; but when Senators come to examine the substitute, and to get at the bottom of it, they will find that instead of the producer being protected by that measure it will be the gambler in food products, it will be the speculator, it will be the banker who will be protected. The banker and the dealer in food products are engaged in a legitimate business; I am not saying they are not; but they must have their "rake-off" in every case; and either the producer or the consumer, or both, must foot the bill. Now, let me return to section 24 of the substitute. That section reads:

Whenever in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation—

That is, the War Finance Corporation—

the public interest may require it the corporation shall be authorized and empowered to make advances upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine—

To whom can such advances be made? To any association of producers, or, to take the other horn of the dilemma, to the consumers or any association of consumers? Oh, no, Mr. President. Following the same policy which runs all through the substitute, such advances can be made—to any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which may have made advances for agricultural purposes, including the breeding, raising, fattening, and marketing of live stock.

As I have previously said to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I have not any objection to that provision, although I think it will be nearly a dead letter. However, I would vote for it rather than have nothing; I would vote for it as an amendment to the committee bill. There may be a possibility of good in it, but, as I look at it, the possibility is very small. If anything is done under that provision and the one that I shall read later, we shall need not only the billion dollars which is provided for in the substitute bill but we shall need $20,000,000,000. I think, to be fair, that this matter ought to be turned over to the Federal Reserve Board. That board has the facilities, I think, to carry out this provision and to do just exactly what it provides for.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Nebraska has stated that it would require $20,000,000,000 to finance the domestic requirements of the American farmer. My understanding is that in the best agricultural year we have had, that of 1919, the entire agricultural product of the country was valued at about $16,000,000,000. So the Senator's estimate would mean $4,000,000,000 more to finance the requirements of the farmer than the entire crop which was produced in the bumper year of 1919 was worth.

However, that is not the point which I wished to discuss, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the figures which I have given represent only an estimate. I have not any direct figures, but I know what the banking condition is, I think, in the agricultural sections of the country, and a billion dollars would not be a drop in the bucket.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the Senator from Nebraska was quite serious in his statement; I thought he was merely making it without reflection.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say right there that I am serious about the matter, but I will say to the Senator that I confess the figures which I gave represented merely an estimate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had reference to the amount which would be necessary to finance the situation, as stated by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. As to that amount, the figures which I gave were merely an estimate.

Mr. SIMMONS. However, I wish to say to the Senator that he has raised a question which I wish frankly to discuss with him for a moment. Does the Senator think that billion and a half dollars, which would be the potential capital which this corporation would have under the substitute measure—

Mr. NORRIS. Am I right about that being the amount which would be available?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the Senator is right about that. The billion and a half dollars covers the capital stock and bonds which the corporation may issue. The Senator from Nebraska, however, does not take into account the fact that this is to be a revolving fund. As the War Finance Corporation loans money and acquires securities, it may sell those securities, it may collect on them, and lend out the money, so that it may loan very much more than the amount provided. However, that is not so important; but I think the Senator is entirely mistaken in his assumption that $1,500,000,000 will not be amply sufficient, both for the purposes of financing exports and for the purposes of financing the domestic situation.

The Senator will remember that during the war, when we organized the War Finance Corporation to meet the tremendous demands that were then being made to finance our great war industries, the same point was made then, that the capital that would be provided for that institution would not be sufficient for the purpose. The answer was made—and experience has confirmed the soundness of the answer—that there was money in the country, probably reasonably adequate to finance the industries, but, for some reason or other, on account of lack of confidence, probably, money could not be obtained. It was available for other purposes, but not for the particular purpose. It was further answered that the passage of the act, putting the Government, through an agency created by it, behind the financing, so that it could furnish the funds, would so inspire confidence in capital and in investments in connection with these industries that probably but very little of that money would have to be loaned out by the corporation. Experience proved that that conjecture was well founded, because almost instantly after we passed that bill it was found that the great financial institutions of the country and private investors came to the rescue, and it was not necessary for the Finance Corporation to invest any large amount of money.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will be compelled to conclude very shortly, and I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can elaborate the thought later, if the Senator objects to my proceeding now. I thought that probably he would at this time welcome some discussion of the question that he had raised.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to be discourteous to the Senator; I realize that what he was saying has weight.

Mr. SIMMONS. I could finish in a few moments what I was going to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Again, Mr. President, the Senator knows that a few years ago when the farmers of the country were finding it exceedingly difficult to finance their crops, Secretary McAdoo came to their rescue and deposited with the banks of the South and the West $400,000,000, and immediately upon his doing that the money came from financial sources in this country amply sufficient to finance the crop. The fact that the Government got behind the movement brought forth the necessary money.

Recently, as the Senator knows, when we were about to pass an act for the purpose of appropriating $50,000,000 to relieve the situation confronting the stock raisers of the country, the moment that it was seen that the Government was ready and willing to go to the rescue of that great industry to the extent of $50,000,000, the banks, which had been refusing and withholding credit, came down here and said, "If the Government wants to do this thing we are willing to do it, and there is no necessity of the Government furnishing this money; we will go home and will make arrangements to let the stock raisers have all the money they may need."

Mr. President, this bill will act in the same way even if the fund is not adequate. I think it is adequate in itself; but, if it is not adequate, it will restore the needed confidence in the investing public. There is an abundance of money here to finance the crop, but it has not confidence; it does not want to do so unless it is compelled to do so, unless somebody else steps in and will do so and thereby take away from it the privilege of financing the business of the Nation. As soon as the Government enters into the business of loaning sufficient money to finance the agricultural situation, in my judgment we will find that the tight money in the great financial centers will at once become loosened and those centers will furnish the money for the financing of the whole agricultural situation, just as they said they would furnish money to finance the live-stock industry of the country provided the Government was going to do it if they did not do it.

I will not detain the Senate any longer. I merely injected that because I think the Senator probably has reached an erroneous conclusion about the sufficiency of the fund.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have in the main, so far as I heard it, no fault to find with the Senator's argument. In the main, I think it is an argument that under existing conditions the Government is justified in going into some kind of a plan or scheme to help finance the agricultural situation. I still disagree with the Senator as to the amount of money necessary to do any good under section 24. I have read only a part of it. As I look at it, it is a banking proposition entirely. This morning I asked a Senator from the South—from the cotton belt—how much, in his judgment, it would take to relieve the situation if section 24 were used as a means by which it should be done; and he gave me his opinion that it would take, I think, four or perhaps it was five billions of dollars to do it in his State alone.

Why, Mr. President, we ought to realize the magnitude of the proposition; and when you criticize the committee bill for putting the Government into business, if that strikes you hard, this proposition will make you dizzy and take away your breath. There is no end to it. It is an enormous undertaking. My own idea, as I said before, is that it ought to be handled by the Federal Reserve Board, who have the instrumentality, I think, to do it. This corporation will not be able to relieve the situation. Under the substitute bill, if they should use all the capital stock of the corporation and all the bonds to the maximum limit, they would get altogether a billion and a half—$1,500,000,000. If they used all of that under section 24, it would not, in my judgment, when spread over the United States, or the agricultural portion of it, over the South and the West, be a drop in the bucket; and if they used it all there, there would not be anything left to do any of the other things provided for in the substitute bill.

Now, Mr. President, if I may proceed again with section 24, this clause that I have read, which was only a part of it, provides that this money can be loaned to any bank or banker—there is a case where you can loan it to an individual if he is in the banking business, provided he has loaned something to a farmer on agricultural products—to any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States. They can use this money for that purpose to relieve the banking situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that while I do not know, I think this word is not used altogether in the sense in which he interprets it. If it is, probably it ought to be changed. The word "banker," I think, is intended there to cover the case of an individual who is doing a banking business. There are, I suppose, in all the agricultural sections many banks that are owned absolutely by one person who is engaged in the banking business. That is his business. He has a bank of his own.

If it does not mean that there, it ought to be so defined as to make it mean that.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is what it is desired to do, there is not any use in using the word "banker," because "bank" will include a bank that is owned by one man as well as a bank that is owned by a thousand men; but he must be a banker, anyway. He must be in the banking business. He must be a man who is going to get a rake-off. The farmer pays the bill. It is a loaning proposition. The producer has to pay the interest.

Before I read the balance of this section, which adds greatly to the amount of money that will be expended and carries it away out into the field of business, let me pause right there just a moment. Probably I had better read the balance of it, however. I shall not read all of the language, because it is simply instructive as to how these advances can be made. They must be made upon a promissory note or notes or other instrument of indebtedness and they must impose upon the bank or banker or trust company an obligation to repay the advance when it is due—of course, that would be understood—and such advances may be made for a period not exceeding a year, and may be extended from time to time through renewals or the substitution of new obligations or otherwise, but the time for the payment of any such advance shall not extend beyond two years from the date on which such advance was originally made.

Now, think of that language, how broad it is. They can take this money, that comes from the Federal Treasury and from the sale of bonds to the people of the United States, and loan it to any bank or banker or trust company for a year. They can extend it to two years. The banking company can take up the securities and substitute other securities or additional securities can be demanded. It is a real banking proposition; so we are putting the Government, through the instrumentality of this corporation, into the banking business absolutely.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the Senator misunderstands that provision.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not intended to extend two years' credit to the bank. It is intended to extend two years' credit to the person to whom the bank has made advances.

Mr. NORRIS. It extends two years' credit to the bank.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me just a minute, the bank is not permitted to borrow of the corporation except to the extent of the advances that it has made for agricultural purposes. Now, it may renew that obligation from time to time and run it on for two years, but in the renewals it can not renew for any greater sum than the unpaid amount of the advances, so that the bank can get no credit except for the purpose of taking care of an obligation that it holds against a farmer for an advance, and at no time more than the amount of the unpaid advances.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read the language, Mr. President. I do not think there is any disagreement between the Senator and myself as to what it means. I do not believe there can be any doubt that this puts the Government into the banking business. This talk about putting the Government into business was one of the fundamental criticisms of the committee bill from the beginning, and one that has been used to condemn us from one end of the country to the other as reactionaries, as fools, and as idiots. Why, Mr. President, we have not come within a million miles of putting the Government in business as far as this provision puts it in. Under this provision the corporation has authority to loan the money that it has thus acquired to any bank or banker or trust company in the United States. It can extend the loans, providing it does not extend them for more than two years.

The bank must sign a note to pay the debt; that is true. The bank must agree to pay the debt at maturity, and it must have loaned money to farmers. That is putting the Government in the banking business with a vengeance. That is the same way that the city bank loans money to the country bank, the same way that the Federal reserve bank loans to its member banks. They ought to be doing this business instead of the Government; and you fellows who have condemned the Agricultural Committee as being idiotic and crazy because they are putting the Government into business ought, if you are sincere in that criticism, to be struck dead with this proposition. It goes so far beyond anything that we had proposed that there is no comparison between the two; and yet you swallow it as though you liked it, without a word of condemnation or criticism. If the banks get a rake-off, if the speculator "gets his," it is all right then for the Government to go into the banking business.

Following the clause that I read, and to clear up any possible misunderstanding between the Senator from North Carolina and myself, let me read about these advances:

Such advance or advances may be made upon the promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments, in such form as to impose on the borrowing bank, banker, or trust company a primary and unconditional obligation to pay the advance at maturity with interest as stipulated therein, and shall be fully and adequately secured in each instance by indorsement, guaranty, pledge, or otherwise. Such advances may be made for a period not exceeding one year—and the corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such advance—

That is what I said—

That is what I said—

through renewals, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise—

That is more than I said—

but the time for the payment of any such advance shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such advance was originally made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that at the time I was discussing this matter a little while ago I made the statement that this loan, if postponed, would have to be postponed in the interest of the borrowing farmer, because there is a provision in the bill to the effect that the loan shall not exceed the unpaid amount of the original advance.

Mr. NORRIS. That language is not in this section.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was about to say to the Senator what has just been called to my attention by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCormick], that it is in the section with reference to exports. I was under the impression that it was also in the section with reference to domestic loans; but I find that it is not, and I think very clearly it ought to be put there by an amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is my purpose to offer an amendment inserting the same provision in section 24 as is inserted in section 22, making the same limitation, so that it will be confined to advances for agriculture.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I am making is that the bank can not renew that loan at any time if the obligation has been paid. If it renews it, it must renew it for the purpose of further protection.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator was mistaken about that being in here.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it ought to be put in both sections.

Mr. NORRIS. My idea is that it would help it some. It would still leave it, according to the theory of this substitute, in such a condition that no farmer or bunch of farmers could get any of this money except through a banker. We have in my State alone an organization of producers, the Farmers' Union, which I presume sometimes in one day takes into the various elevators which they own in the State enough of the members' own wheat to load a ship. But if that organization came to this corporation with 1,000,000 bushels of wheat as security and said, "We have $1,000,000 worth of good wheat, and we want to borrow some money," what would the corporation say? They would say, "See a banker. We can not loan you farmers anything. You are not entitled to any of this money. Go your way." But if you borrow some money of a banker, even though you do not put up any security at all and are not worth a dollar, we are empowered to loan to the banker who has loaned to you. Go to a speculator. Go to any financing corporation. Go to a trust company and mortgage your property to them. They will fix you a rate that will be liberal, and they will let it run until the interest runs up so high that there will not be anything left, and they will foreclose it. But we can not let you have any of this money. That would be putting the Government in business, and we must not do it. We deal with bankers, not with farmers. Here is a farming proposition, here is an agricultural proposition, but it must be operated by bankers, it must be operated by middlemen, it must be operated by speculators.

They are welcome to come to the Treasury of the United States and reach in their hands, and get the taxpayers' money, and loan it to the farmers themselves, but if you bring all the farmers in America, with the cotton piled up as high as a mountain, with 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, and offer to put it all at the feet of this corporation and mortgage it all to them, they will not loan you a dollar, not a dollar.

That is the situation in which we are. That is what we are up against now, as between these two bills putting the Government into business.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. What would happen if they wanted to borrow money under the Senator's bill?

Mr. NORRIS. If we had the bill as I wanted it—

Mr. LENROOT. Could they borrow a dollar?

Mr. NORRIS. This corporation would be able to buy. It will be able to finance cooperative organizations of producers of wheat, or cotton, or any other agricultural products.

Mr. LENROOT. They will be able to do so under this substitute, if they are engaged in exporting, will they not?

Mr. NORRIS. The farmers might get together, under this provision, and organize a bank. They might get together and organize a trust company, under section 24, and get some money.

Mr. LENROOT. I wanted to ask the Senator whether, except for exporting, his bill would offer any relief whatever so far as advances are concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think it would.

Mr. LENROOT. How could it?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me take up now another difference between these two bills which is fundamental.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been obliged to attend two committee meetings this morning and will have to attend one this afternoon, and will not be able to hear all of the Senator's argument, and it is for that reason that I was particularly anxious to ask a question along the line of the question of the Senator from Wisconsin, to develop the thought further.

Under the Senator's bill, power is given to this corporation to buy and sell. I think I can understand how, if this corporation went out to buy five or ten million bushels of wheat in a given State, for the time being it would perhaps create an additional demand, and thereby increase the price which the farmer might get at that particular moment. But suppose it comes to the time later when this corporation has a very large quantity of wheat on hand and seeks to dispose of it. Will not the fact that the Government has that large quantity of wheat, and is likely to sell it at any time, have a very unsteady effect upon the market—just as, for instance, during the war the Government bought up very large quantities of wool for war purposes?

The end of the war came much earlier than was anticipated by many. The Government had that wool. Of course, the price was increased somewhat when the wool was bought, but later on these great warehouses filled with wool have disturbed the market very greatly, and each time the Government has attempted to unload that wool, or sell it, the effect has been, as I understand it, materially to interfere with the price that the farmer gets for his wool. My thought is, if we were to adopt the plan proposed in the Senator's bill, might it not in the end have a very unsteady effect upon the market?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator, and I am going to be; and I frankly say to the Senator from Ohio that if that provision remained in the bill, and the corporation set up in the bill were in operation, it would be possible for it to do just what the Senator has said, in my judgment. I think that could happen.

Mr. POMERENE. Will not the Senator make that statement stronger, and instead of saying that it is "possible," say that it would probably happen?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I would not say that. I do not believe it would happen. Let me give the Senator an example of what may happen when we try to frame a bill for anything. When the committee brought in an amendment about agricultural products in their manufactured as well as in the raw state, we were condemned and laughed at and made fun of because we used the word "manufactured." They said that under that you could engage in the exporting of cotton cloth. Technically, they were right. But the committee wanted to put in "manufactured" principally because they wanted to enable this corporation to export flour instead of wheat, oatmeal instead of oats, corn meal instead of corn, wherever they could, and we thought that language was necessary. It never was contemplated that the corporation would engage in the shipping of boots and shoes, for instance, the products of hides; yet, technically, they would have authority to do that.

I think if this corporation started out to do evil, and had an evil mind, were not acting in good faith, and used their money to buy up any crop, or a large portion of it, and hoard it and keep it, they might perform the very operation the Senator has outlined. Yet, if we give them the authority, we have to rely somewhat upon their intelligence and their honesty and take whatever risk there is in it. You can not give to any corporation, set up in any bill, any authority which may not be abused. There may be evil come out of it, I concede.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has been very kind and very frank in his statement, but it seems to me this situation would present itself: Let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that this corporation had a hundred million bushels of wheat on hand. Of course, it must follow that if the Government buys this wheat it must sell it, and the very minute it tries to sell this hundred million bushels of wheat might there not be a lot of Representatives and Senators and others from certain localities saying to the Government corporation which held this wheat, "Now, do not sell that; we want to unload our wheat"; and the result would be that perhaps those in charge might be influenced to the extent of holding that wheat when it ought to have been sold, and that might bring about a very serious loss to the Government?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that might happen. Let me picture a thing that might happen under the substitute bill, and I do not offer it as an objection to the bill, but to show how you can conjure up dire consequences which may result from the passage of any bill.

The Senator has referred to the fact that Representatives and Senators would try to influence the corporation. Of course, they have not any right to attempt that. If this corporation is honorable and honest, they will not yield to anything of that kind, no matter what Senators or what Representatives ask them to do it. The probabilities are that no Representatives or Senators will ask them to do it.

But let us take section 24 of the substitute bill. Here is the provision which enables this corporation to loan—and there is no limit fixed—to any bank or banker or trust company in the United States. Suppose they were in operation now, and the banks of North Carolina wanted a lot of money, and they loaned it to them. The banks out in Wyoming might want to get some, the banks out in Kansas might want to get some, and the banks out in Nebraska might want to get some, and the corporation would say, "We have not one-tenth of enough to go around. What are we going to do?"

Here are some Representatives, here are some Senators, more influential than others. They say, "We will get it for our States; let the others go." I do not think that would happen, but it is a possibility which may happen under this provision.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. You will never get any cure, I will say to the Senator, for any evil on earth but what there is a possibility of somebody abusing the authority that is given them under the law. I yield now to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I entirely agree with the Senator in that last statement. I am as anxious as he to get something that is going to be helpful, but the possibilities which I have suggested are not entirely imaginary. Let me illustrate.

In my own State we have a large machine-tool industry. They sold machine tools in enormous quantities to the Government. The Government sold many of those machine tools in France. Some of those people wrote me protesting against the sale of these machine tools in France by the Government, because to the extent that they sold those machine tools in France it would destroy their market in France for other machine tools.

I could go on and give several other illustrations of that same kind. Another one was a little experience that I had in connection with tractor engines. I did not interfere. I felt that the Government ought to sell and dispose of those things. I felt that many of those people had received very substantial profits in their sales, and I hardly thought it was the right thing to ask public officials to interfere and have the Government keep on hand those materials for which we had no use.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's own illustration answers his own argument. He is afraid if we pass this bill that some Senator or Congressman will influence some of those officials not to do their duty right or to be selfish about it, and yet he gives an illustration where it did not work.

Mr. POMERENE. No; it did not.

Mr. NORRIS. It did not work. The Senator is afraid that some other place it will work, and perhaps it will. I am not going to vouch, no matter which bill is passed or if any bill is passed, that there will not be a great many mistakes made. Some of them ought to be avoided, and some of them will perhaps be very wrong. I do not know how to cure that, but I would like to do so if I could.

I had a letter just a few days before the Fourth of July from an organization which wanted me to get an appropriation of $5,000 through Congress at once—it was only 10 days before the Fourth of July—for them to use in celebrating the Fourth of July, and to back it up they showed how patriotic the organization had been in the war, how many soldiers they had, how many had been killed, and so forth. They made a great showing. "Now, we are going to celebrate the saving of civilization by the American Army, and we think it is fair that you should get $5,000 appropriated out of the public fund, because it was the United States Government that we saved." That did not work either.

We can not avoid these things. I presume the people who make the demands in most cases are moved by an honest motive. They do not realize that they are biased and prejudiced. They are unconsciously prejudiced, biased, and selfish, and do not know it. That criticism will apply, I think, to anything that we may pass, either on this subject or any other.

When I was diverted I was about to read the balance of section 24, which I have not yet finished.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield for a question, but I do wish Senators would not take up my time, because I am just about exhausted. I am very tired.

Mr. DIAL. Very well, Mr. President; I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was about to make a comparison of which I was reminded by an interruption of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] which I believe is fundamental between the two bills. I think they both have two good features in them. I would not object; indeed, I would be glad to have some of those propositions in the substitute bill added to the committee bill as an amendment, but the committee had in mind a market and not a financing proposition. There is a fundamental difference between the two. One is a marketing proposition and the other is a financing proposition, which means the holding of the agricultural products until a market suitable to the holder is found.

I think that while the financing of the agriculturists and the holding of agricultural products for reasonable market conditions is important and desirable, it does not compare with the fact that what we need more than anything else is a place to sell the surplus products. That is what the committee bill tries to solve. The financing proposition carried on, if a market does not present itself, means in itself ultimately the ruin of the agriculturists. If you can borrow money on your cotton and hold it and continue to pay interest to the bankers on your borrowed money, the time will come when you will be bankrupt and will lose all of your cotton. The banker will have it in the way of interest. There must come a time of liquidation. There must come a day of sale. If you finance only and never make provision for the sale or exportation of your product, you have only delayed for a time the ruin that must come.

This corporation, under the provisions of the substitute bill, will loan to banks and bankers. Under section 24 those loans can run for two years.

If at the end of two years the market is unsatisfactory, the product must be sold under the hammer for whatever it will bring. The farmers of America need a market more than any other one thing, and so, while I would welcome some of these provisions for temporary assistance, it is nothing in my opinion that will bring relief unless some provision is made for the financing of the absolute sale in foreign countries on time—because that is the only way we can sell there—of the farm products of America. It will only add to the burden by postponing the day of liquidation and adding to it the interest that the banker must have in the meantime.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information. The Senator's bill confines itself to financing exports. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks under the provisions of the bill that the great stock-raising industry of the West could possibly get any benefit in view of the fact that live stock is not exported from this country. I wish to ask him if he thinks under the provisions of his bill the wool producer of the West, in view of the fact that we do not raise enough wool for our own consumption and are not exporters of wool, could possibly get any benefit under that provision. I am asking for information what his views are about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Again let me say to the Senator, as I have so often said, that I think some of the provisions are good. I am not objecting to the provision to loan the money to the stock raisers. I think we ought to do it. I think it is a banking proposition, and that the Federal reserve banks ought to do it. But if we can do it through this instrumentality I am willing to do that. Let me tell the Senator more at length my theory of it.

If we only finance these agricultural products, wool, cotton, corn, or wheat, to be held by the middlemen under the provisions of the bill, if we only finance them so they can be held, or even go further and finance them through cooperative organization, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], seems to think could be done under the provisions of the bill; if we do nothing else, if we make no provision for a market, no place to sell, when the note is due, what are you going to do then? No one has got anything out of it but the banker. He gets his interest, and when that condition goes on long enough he gets the product and the farmer gets nothing, but is probably left in debt when he gets through.

The theory that I have in mind, and what I think will work out under the committee bill, would be to market these surplus crops as provided in the bill, in foreign countries, to sell the bonds of the corporation and repeat the operation and get rid of the surplus. The farmer who has produced it gets the money. He pays his note in the bank and the bank gets relief. The bank pays the larger bank from which it has borrowed. Mr. Jones pays his borrowed money to Mr. Smith. The money all gets into the channels of commerce and business gets better. Men are not in debt as much as they were. The farmers commence to buy. Everybody else commences to buy.

When we start the prosperity upon the farmer, with the sale of the surplus products, it runs through all the lines of business clear to the top, and everybody gets the benefit of it, the hard times disappear, men get work, and factories start up again.

There is more demand for wool. People commence to wear woolen clothing instead of going in rags. They have had some money, because as the foundation corner stone of it all there has come relief in the shape of money. The agricultural surplus products have been sold. The farmer has paid his debt and everybody else pays his debt, and the money that the farmer gets goes into the bank, and before it gets through in its travels it has paid a thousand debts and the country is prosperous.

We will never get prosperity simply by loaning money and having everything held in statu quo. There must come a day of liquidation. There must come a day when those things must be sold, and if we do not take advantage of it now and provide for a market under fair conditions, the banker's chattel mortgage eventually, when he no longer can extend the time, because the interest has mounted up until the security is not sufficient to pay the debt, will be foreclosed and the security sold for cash under the hammer in a locality where nobody has any money, where there is no money, and where it will not bring one-half what could be got for it now. That is what I fear if we do not provide a market.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator has entirely misconceived my question. The Senator's bill provides for no advancement of money by the corporation except money loaned for the purpose of the immediate exportation of farm products.

The statement with which I prefaced the question which I asked in my first interruption was, as the stock raisers of this country do not export their stock, the stock raisers could get no part of the proposed advances; as the woolgrowers do not export their wool, the woolgrowers could get no part of the proposed advances under the Senator's bill. Under the substitute there is an additional provision with reference to the financing of exports which permits the corporation to loan to a farmer or other person, in order to enable him to hold his product and carry it until it can be sold on a reasonable market.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not object to interruptions, but I must insist that I am not able to proceed much longer. I shall have to conclude.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am only trying to develop my question.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from North Carolina is doing a good work; his speech is fine, and all that; but if the Senator insists on continuing his speech, I shall have to surrender the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield further.

Mr. SIMMONS. I certainly shall not insist upon interrupting the Senator if he does not desire me to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator from North Carolina; his remarks are absolutely applicable; but I have answered them, and I am not going to answer them again.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, he did answer them, but his answer included grants under the substitute and not the grants under his bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I differ with the Senator as to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was asking the Senator about his bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the committee bill, as I have tried to outline it, would bring about the relief in the particular channels of which the Senator from North Carolina has spoken. However, I repeat that I am not opposing the loaning of money to cattlemen; I favor it; but I think the Federal reserve bank ought to do that. Let me repeat, I shall not object to a provision being inserted in the bill by the Senate that will do it, though I do not believe the relief which the Senator thinks will be afforded will be realized under the kind of a provision found in the proposed substitute.

Whether that is good or not, it, at least, is my explanation. The Senator ought to remember that my own theory was that when the farmer sold his product, instead of holding it and going in debt more in order to hold it, he got the money; he paid the bank with the money; he paid the neighbor that he owed, if he owed a neighbor; the bank paid its debts; everybody paid their debts; that money paid a thousand debts; it went all the way up. The farmer out in Nebraska who pays his bank will enable the bank to pay somebody in New York; the payment of that debt will enable the recipient to pay somebody in Chicago; and he will pay somebody else. In other words, when it is started going from the bottom the payment of debt travels all through our system of business. What does that mean? It means that prosperity instead of stagnation will prevail in the country; it means that people will commence to buy woolen clothing and wool will go up; it means a demand for the products that have no market abroad, the sale of what must be marketed abroad, and the getting of the money back into America with which to pay debts that are owed by the people who have the products which ought to be exported. It will help the sale of the products, and it will help those who own the products which are exported.

But, on the other hand, the financing operations will only delay the day of judgment. There must eventually be a market, and that market must be abroad. It may be that the situation may be financed until—and I suppose that is the theory—there will be a market abroad. That plan may work; I hope it will if it is necessary for us to have that system. However, I desire to do, and the committee bill provides for doing, something to take our surplus products to the starving people who wish to buy them, who are willing to mortgage everything they have on earth and to work with bended backs until they pay their debts.

Mr. President, I have not yet finished with section 24 of the substitute; I have only read a part of it. Let me commence where I left off and read some more. That section continues:

The corporation may, in exceptional cases, upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, purchase from domestic banks, bankers, or trust companies' notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other instruments of indebtedness secured by chattel mortgages, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, or other instruments in writing conveying or securing marketable title to staple agricultural products, including live stock. The corporation may from time to time upon like security extend the time of payment of any note, draft, bill of exchange or other instrument acquired under this section, but the time for the payment of any such note, draft, bill of exchange or other instrument shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such note, draft, bill of exchange or other instrument was acquired by the corporation.

Advances or purchases may be made under this section at any time prior to July 1, 1922.

That is Government in business with a vengeance. Those who have been criticizing and deriding and denouncing us because we had put the Government into business under the committee bill are now standing for a proposition that will enable the War Finance Corporation to take the money, go out into the country and buy chattel mortgages of banks wherever they please; anywhere in the United States. They can extend the time of payment to the banks and bankers and trust companies up to two years. They can not buy a note or a chattel mortgage from the producer; they can not buy a note or a chattel mortgage on a million bushels of wheat secured by a cooperative association of farmers; they can not loan money on a thousand bales of cotton owned by the producers, secured by chattel mortgage on that cotton, but they can buy the chattel mortgage of the bank; they can buy the note of the bank; they can buy the note of the banker; they can buy the note of the trust company. If a cooperative association having property of a value of a million dollars went to this corporation, representing the Government and having funds contributed by the taxpayers of America, and said, "Here is a million dollars' worth of our own cotton that we have produced; we want to avoid the middleman and the banker and the speculator; lend us a hundred thousand dollars on it and we will give you a million dollars of security," what would the corporation say? They would say, "Go to a banker; we will not loan to you; the Congress has provided that we can not loan to you. We must have a middleman who must have a rake-off in this deal; we can not deal with you, no matter how much you may have or what your security may be."

The Government in finance! If the War Finance Corporation have money enough, under this provision they could buy all the notes and mortgages that are held by all the banks and trust companies of the United States. If the corporation is supplied with sufficient money, under section 24 they could put the Federal reserve banks out of business; they could buy up all the notes, all the mortgages, and all the certificates of indebtedness.

The Government in business! Oh, you who are so afraid that the Government, through the instrumentality of the corporation set up in the committee bill, might do something for the agriculturist, something for the producer in the effort to remove some of his burdens, to enable him to sell some of his surplus products, to avoid the middleman—you who are so anxious to have that done, for God's sake why do you resort to the method provided in the substitute bill? You will let the farmer starve; you will let the farmer die unless he is able to get help and assistance through the instrumentality of a bank, a speculator, a dealer, or a hoarder of agricultural products.

The Government in business! Afraid to put the Government in business! The substitute proposes to start the Government out on a procedure that if carried to its maximum extremity will eliminate and wipe out of existence the Federal reserve banking system. I do not see how anybody can stand for it.

Put in the bill, if you want to do so, some provisions that will enable the corporation to loan money to live-stock men for a reasonable length of time, but never start out loaning to the agriculturists of this country on interest that he must pay and, added to the interest that he ought to pay, a rake-off to the middleman—never ask him to do that, unless you provide also some way by which he will be able to sell the product that he has mortgaged. If you do not so provide you have done him an injury instead of a benefit; you have made a gamble that, without any assistance, without any attempt in that direction, the markets abroad will open up sufficiently to relieve the situation. Would it not be safer to pass some provisions similar to the one which is in the committee bill by which at least we make an extreme effort to find a market and to finance the sale of surplus agricultural products in foreign markets? That will bring money to the farmer, instead of a new note that he must sign, involving the payment of more interest to the banks. That is the fundamental difference between these two propositions, as I see it, Mr. President.

The Government is all right in business when it will take a risk for financial men that they are not willing to take themselves. The Government is all right in business if the middleman and the banker and the trust company can get their rake-off. Then it is all right. Then it is a virtue. If they are eliminated it is a crime, it is foolish, it is reactionary, it is populist, it is dishonorable, it is unpatriotic. The Government is all right in business if it will vote some money to railroads. It is all right in business if it will help the bankers. It is all right in business if it will help the corporations that want to hold the farm products of America for higher prices. It is all right then. It is all wrong if the farmer gets into it. Then it is a crime. Then it is a bad governmental policy.

Induce the farmers of America to add another mortgage on top of their present indebtedness, secured by their surplus products, by which they agree to pay two years more of interest at 10 or 12 per cent, and in some places a higher rate. That is government in business. That is all right. So that you will place the farmer at the end of the two years, unless relief comes in some other way, at the mercy of the man who holds the chattel mortgage; and I am not finding fault with the man who holds the chattel mortgage. He is entitled to his money. He will not extend that mortgage any longer than he realizes his security is good. I do not find fault with him; and within the two years, if no market comes, then the banker must foreclose, and the market, if there be none better than now, will be such that the product will not pay the indebtedness.

What happens then? The country bank fails; the city bank goes with it; the factory has to stop, and these banks that have sold the farmers' notes to this corporation, financed by your money, will not be able to collect from the banker; and what then? There is a possible loss. There is a probable loss. It can not go beyond two years, under the terms of the bill itself; and with the interest accumulated now, with the price of the market, and no sale for the surplus farm products, it will not be two years that the farmer can stand paying additional interest on the already overburdening indebtedness; and when he can not pay the bank can not collect, and when the bank does not collect we all go down together, including this corporation.

But get a market, and what is the difference? Sell this product. There are millions of people who want to buy it, and who are suffering for it now. They have not the cash. The committee bill provides a means by which it can be done; and then the farmer, instead of signing a new note for more money, gets the money to pay his indebtedness, and the whole thing loosens up as I have heretofore described.

Mr. President, we never can get on our feet right until we are able to sell our surplus products in a foreign market. We can not sell them here. We never have. We never will be able to. We can not sell them in a foreign market now and sell them for cash. We must sell on time. Under the committee bill, if everything went to smash and they lost everything there would be a maximum loss to the taxpayers of $600,000,000—$100,000,000 capital and $500,000,000 bonds. That is the maximum loss that can come. What would happen under the substitute bill? The maximum loss there is $1,500,000,000—$500,000,000 capital stock subscribed by the Government, and $1,000,000,000 of bonds. There is practically three times the amount of money involved in the substitute that is involved in this much-condemned and criticized bill.

I am not anticipating a loss in either case; but the loss, if it must come, is more liable to come under the substitute, because the substitute does not profess to get a market. It is a method of adding to the indebtedness already existing by paying more interest. Eventually the product must be sold in order for the corporation to get out, and get out whole. The other proposition starts out at the beginning to get a market. I think some provisions of the other bill ought to be included—at least, I have no objection to their inclusion—that would enable some financing to be done. I think that is necessary. I voted in favor of every proposition of that kind; but standing alone it will come home to plague us. It will rise up in our pathway a year or two from now, and ruin and financial disaster will stare us in the face.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. KING. I did not hear all of the statement of the Senator; but, as I recall, his position is that the substitute, if it shall be enacted into law, will cause greater loss to the Government in the event of loss than could possibly ensue under the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Now, may I make just one observation, and if that is incorrect I shall be glad to be advised.

The bill which has been reported by the committee calls for an appropriation of $100,000,000 to form the capital of the corporation which is to be organized. It also puts the Government behind the bonds which may be issued, and guarantees them. That is indefinite, or at least it may go to $1,000,000,000, and we do not know how much more.

Mr. NORRIS. No, no; it does guarantee them. I argued that, and the Senator was not in the Chamber at the time. I do not think I ought to go over that subject again; but I do not want the Senator's question to stand in the Record apparently unanswered, so I will go over it again.

The committee has reported an amendment that cuts down the bonded indebtedness that this corporation can contract to five times its capital stock instead of ten. That means that the maximum amount under that bill, supposing that every dollar was lost that could be lost, would be $100,000,000 capital and $500,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. KING. That would be $600,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That would make $600,000,000. That is what I have stated already. Now, then, this corporation under the substitute bill has a capital stock of $500,000,000, all subscribed by the Government. They have a right under the substitute to issue bonds to the amount of twice their capital stock. That is $1,000,000,000. That makes $1,500,000,000. So the maximum loss, taking both together now—just taking the maximum in each case—is $1,500,000,000 in the substitute, and $600,000,000 in the committee bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator assumes, then, that under the substitute bill the Government is a guarantor of all the bonds which could be issued by the corporation?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I went over that.

Mr. KING. I do not think the bill means that. I admit that the Government would be responsible for the capital which is pledged, which would be $500,000,000, and that might be absorbed in meeting the obligations.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to argue it now on the theory that the Government is not liable. I argued that when the Senator was not in the Chamber. I do not want to go over it again, but I will, briefly.

Under the substitute bill the capital stock is $500,000,000, every dollar of which is subscribed by the Government; so when they lose, even if the Government never guaranteed a bond and never paid a bond, if there is a maximum loss it must lose $500,000,000. Under the committee bill, if there was a maximum loss, if every dollar was squandered, then they would lose $600,000,000. That would be $100,000,000 more under the committee bill than under the substitute bill, providing the Government did not feel like guaranteeing the bonds, but as I have shown, I think, and as was argued by the Senator from New Jersey, who was criticizing and condemning our bill, the Government is morally bound in this corporation for every dollar of bonds and for every dollar of interest on them, and I do not believe anybody will question the fact that it is morally bound. It is a corporation the capital stock of which is made up entirely of Government funds. The officers are Government officials. No individual in his individual capacity has a word to say. They sell a billion dollars' worth of bonds. It is all done by a Government corporation, with Government money behind it, with Government officials doing it. Would anybody say that the Government was not morally bound to stand behind the bonds that were thus issued?

Mr. President, there are some other things that I wanted to argue, but I am not able to do it, and I shall have to yield the floor at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegge	Harrison	McKinley	Smoot
Broussard	Heflin	McLean	Spencer
Bursum	Hitchcock	McNary	Stanfield
Calder	Johnson	Moses	Sutherland
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Swanson
Capper	Kellogg	Newberry	Townsend
Caraway	Kendrick	Nicholson	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Norbeck	Underwood
Dial	Keyes	Oddie	Wadsworth
Dillingham	King	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	La Follette	Polindexter	Warren
Gerry	Lenroot	Robinson	Watson, Ga.
Gooding	McCormick	Sheppard	Weller
Hale	McCumber	Simmens	Williams
Harris	McKellar	Smith	Willis

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am requested to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on official business. He is in attendance on the Committee on Finance.

I also desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am sure that every Senator regrets the temper in which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has discussed this bill yesterday and to-day. It is in striking contrast with his usual custom, and in striking contrast with his opening speech which began the debate upon this measure. Yesterday and to-day the chairman of the committee has attacked and impugned the motives of nearly everybody who has not agreed with him as to what legislation should be passed in aid of the agricultural interests of the country.

He has attacked the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, as being an Englishman, devoted first to the interests of the British Empire. He has attacked the War Finance Corporation as being a lot of golf players. He has attacked the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who offered this substitute, and attempted to ridicule him as posing as a friend of the farmers.

I know that the Senator from Nebraska was not in his usual, normal frame of mind, or he never would have said some of the things that he did say, and I shall spend but very little time in replying to those features of his speech. With reference to his attack upon the Senator from Minnesota, who offered this substitute, I may say that the Congressional Directory shows that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture is the same kind of a farmer as is the Senator from Minnesota. I find they were both raised upon a farm. I find that since that time both the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and the Senator from Minnesota have devoted themselves to those volumes to which the Senator from Nebraska referred, such as Parson on Contracts, and other well-known textbooks. So that if the Senator from Minnesota is to be ridiculed and placed before the Senate and the country as a false friend of the farmer because of his profession, the Senator from Nebraska must put himself in the same category.

With regard to his attack upon the the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, I am very sorry that the Senator is absent, but I want to say, Mr. President, that Mr. Hoover is rendering a greater service to the agricultural interests of America every day while he is occupying the important position that he now holds than the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture or I will ever be able to render them so long as we live. It is the favorite pastime of two or three Senators upon this floor to attack Mr. Hoover. They will understand in the future, some day, that any such attack upon him reacts only upon themselves.

With regard to his attack upon the War Finance Corporation, ridiculing the members of that corporation as being a lot of golf players, having no understanding of the interests of agriculture, implying that they have no sympathy with them, the chairman of the committee has undergone a very marked change of opinion since the hearings were had upon this bill. Mr. Meyer, the managing director of the War Finance Corporation, appeared before the committee, and I want to read a paragraph of what the chairman of the committee himself said at that time concerning the War Finance Corporation, which he would now have the country believe to be unfriendly to agriculture. He said:

Of course, Mr. Secretary, Mr. Meyer is connected with the War Finance Corporation. I presume it would be human nature for him to feel as though another organization that would do exclusively the things that his organization has a legal right to do would be looked upon, perhaps unconsciously, with some prejudice. I am satisfied that this committee has a very high regard for Mr. Meyer; I know I have personally, and the rehabilitation of the War Finance Corporation came about from the action of this committee. The resolution which was finally enacted into law rehabilitating that corporation originated in this committee. I was very much in favor of it.

That was the position of the chairman of the committee on June 30, a little over 30 days ago, and I might read much more, quoting the remarks of the chairman, concerning his high opinion of the War Finance Corporation in the service that it was rendering.

To-day it was very clear from his remarks that the Senator would have the country understand that, so far as he is concerned, he has no confidence in the War Finance Corporation being either able or willing to be of assistance to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. President, what is it that has brought about this change of mind on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture? I think it must be clear to every Senator. The chairman of the committee feels—and I do not doubt honestly feels—that some advantage has been taken of him, that there has been some underhanded and surreptitious work going on in connection with this bill because of some animosity toward him. Mr. President, I know a little something of the history of this bill. I listened carefully to the opening speech of the Senator from Nebraska. In that speech he said:

Let me say, Mr. President, that the committee is moved only by a patriotic desire to relieve what is believed to be a dangerous condition. We have no pride of authorship.

That is what the chairman said one week ago Tuesday.

He also said:

We are here in good faith, Mr. President, and I am glad to say that as far as any debate that the Senate has heard so far is concerned, those who oppose the legislation are exhibiting the same patriotic good faith.

Again, he said:

I appear in no sense to criticize the War Finance Corporation; but through the operation of that corporation it became apparent, I think, to those who have followed it somewhat, that they were not fully equipped to meet the situation, and so, in good faith, with only a desire to legislate so as to relieve the present agricultural condition, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have recommended to the Senate the passage of this bill. Many of its provisions are tentative. The Senate may, upon due consideration and debate, amend or change them, but I hope that all those who oppose it will approach the subject in that spirit. We wish to relieve the situation which everyone admits exists.

Mr. President, the day that speech was made by the chairman of the committee a clear issue was presented, and existed in the Senate at that time, and that issue was whether the committee bill should be passed or whether it should be defeated. There was a very well developed movement in this Chamber to defeat the bill in toto. I, as one Senator, accepted in good faith the statement of the chairman of the committee that they would welcome amendments; not that the committee would, because the bill had gone from the jurisdiction of the committee. It was pending before the Senate. There was only one place where an amendment could be offered under the rules of the Senate, and that was here in the Senate. I as one Senator did not believe that legislation upon this subject should be defeated. There is an emergency, in my opinion, which calls for action. There is such an emergency in relation to agriculture as justifies this Government in doing everything it possibly can, along reasonable and proper lines, to relieve present conditions.

So I, as one Senator, took the position at that time that this bill ought not to be defeated, that it should be amended by having stricken out at least the most objectionable feature, which, to my mind, was the authority to the corporation to buy and sell agricultural products.

I consulted with a number of Senators. I made inquiry if the chairman of the committee would be willing to consider any compromise with regard to this bill. I was told that the proposition was presented to the chairman of the committee, or he was asked if he would be willing to agree to the striking out of that provision of the bill which provided for the authority of this corporation to engage in the business of buying and selling agricultural products, that he was asked whether he would be willing to so modify the personnel of this proposed corporation so that the Secretary of Commerce, the managing director of the War Finance Corporation, and the Secretary of Agriculture should constitute the directors of the corporation.

I was told, Mr. President, that those propositions were presented to the chairman of the committee, and that the reply was made that he could not consider any compromise which would strike out the power to buy and sell agricultural products; that he considered that a very vital feature of his bill.

Possibly I was not correctly informed, but, relying upon that information, I for one felt that it was absolutely useless for any Senator to confer with the chairman of the committee unless he was willing to include in the compromise the power to buy and sell those products, which I, as one Senator, was not.

That being the chairman's position, what possible good could have been accomplished by anyone consulting him with reference to any compromise or substitute bill so long as he held that position?

Then, Mr. President, I myself prepared for offering certain amendments striking out what I believed to be the most dangerous features of the bill. It was then suggested by Senators, not elsewhere, but by Senators upon this floor in private conversation, that instead of creating a new corporation the powers of the War Finance Corporation ought to be enlarged so that the War Finance Corporation might do everything that properly could be done in this emergency. I had forgotten that it was suggested in the debate, but I am just told that it was openly suggested on the floor in discussion of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to say to the Senator that on this side of the Chamber, believing that the War Finance Corporation should be entrusted with the activities provided for in the bill, some of us prepared amendments, or rather a substitute. But, speaking for myself, I suggested to a number of Republicans, notably the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], as I recall, that perhaps the substitute should come from that side of the Chamber, they being the majority side and the bill having been reported from a committee the Republican members of which preponderated.

So, on this side of the Chamber a number of Senators believed that a transfer of activities of the organization to the War Finance Corporation should be made, and I prepared a substitute which I intended to tender to the Senate in the event that the Republicans did not provide a substitute, transferring the activities of the proposed organization to the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have just noticed in the RECORD that on July 22 the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STEHLING] proposed an amendment giving the War Finance Corporation those powers.

Mr. LENROOT. The only point I desired to make was that the suggestion that this be done through the War Finance Corporation, so far as I know, originated among Senators upon this floor and not elsewhere. That is the only point I desire to make.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt a moment—
Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. I addressed the Senate on this subject before the Senator from Nebraska explained the bill, and in that discussion suggested the use of the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it was the evening of the same day that the chairman made his speech that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and I had a conference with Mr. Meyer, the managing director of the War Finance Corporation, and Secretary Hoover. We had several conferences thereafter, and this substitute was framed. I know that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] was consulted, as were others. It was not with a thought that anyone was abrogating to himself any authority that he could not properly assume. There was no thought upon the part of anyone of injuring in anyway the chairman of the committee. We had a situation here where the committee bill, with those vicious features, as some of us thought, was before the Senate, and the chairman himself had invited us expressly to offer something in its place if any Senator thought he could offer something that was better. Time went on. My last connection with the framing of the substitute was last Saturday. I think one or two changes were made after that time.

The charge has been made that this was a deep-laid scheme upon the part of the administration to pull the railroad legislation through and use this as a pusher to do it. Mr. President, so far as I know, not one single Senator was in favor of any such proposition. I had no conversation with the President of the United States prior to the introduction of the substitute, but I think I can say that the President of the United States never suggested to a living soul that those two things should be coupled together.

The substitute is now here and ought to be considered upon its merits. Notwithstanding the feeling that the chairman has, it is no different than any other bill that comes to the Senate with the backing of the committee where any other Senator or group of Senators if they please, if they believe they can offer something that is an improvement over the committee bill, have a perfect right to do so, and there are no ethics of the Senate that demand that they shall go to the chairman of the committee and first ask him how he likes the substitute.

The substitute is here before the Senate now. In the last half hour of the speech of the chairman of the committee he was occupied in denouncing certain provisions of it that the agricultural bloc, so called, of the Senate, of which the chairman is one of the most prominent members, had been insisting should be adopted from the first day that that agricultural bloc met. But here we find him to-day denouncing those very things and trying to prejudice the measure in the eyes of the country because, he says, it seeks to deal with banks and middlemen and not with the original producer.

The contention has been, so far as the credit features are concerned—and section 24 relates only to credit facilities—and speech after speech has been made upon the floor asserting that the Federal Reserve Board withheld, as is claimed, credit facilities from the banks of the country and thus brought about, as is claimed, the condition that now exists; yet when there is offered in a substitute bill the same relief for those credit facilities that these gentlemen, including the chairman of the committee himself, had been urging, it meets with the denunciation of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to turn to the bill itself and compare the substitute introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] with the original introduced by the committee. I may say in passing that according to my understanding the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry this morning determined to cast aside the original bill which the Senator from Nebraska has been championing, and have reported this afternoon substantially the substitute bill, with two or three amendments or changes to which I shall advert before I conclude.

The substitute bill eliminates one very important provision in the original Norris bill, the power to buy and sell agricultural products. The Senator from Nebraska, the chairman of the committee, has stood here to-day, yesterday, and in his opening speech saying that what we need is a market. We all agree. He said there is a demand in Europe from millions of starving people for our wheat; our corn, our oats, and our cotton, and that we want to supply that demand. Yes, Mr. President, there is a demand for everything that we have, in the sense in which the chairman of the committee has used it, and we need not cross the Atlantic Ocean to find that kind of a demand. It exists right here in the United States.

Why, in the same sense in which the chairman used the expression, there is a demand for diamonds in the United States to-day far exceeding the supply. There is a demand in the United States to-day for $5,000 automobiles far exceeding the supply. We would all like diamonds, we would all like better automobiles, we would all like more of everything, and in that sense there is a demand for it. But the reason why we can not wear diamonds, the reason why all of us can not own $5,000 automobiles, is because we have not the wherewithal to pay for those things.

It is only in that sense that there is a demand in Europe that is not being met. Mr. President, there is not a country in Europe to-day that will not use its credit facilities first for the supply of food products to the full extent those products are necessary for the support of its people. No one can gainsay that. No nation can produce anything unless its people are fed first and clothed secondly.

Now, I have no doubt that there are many countries that would buy more freely of our agricultural products if they did not have to pay for them or if they could give such security for them as no business man would ever think for a moment of accepting. We do not need to go to Europe to find such a demand as that. I think I could furnish a thousand men in the United States to-day who would be willing to buy every pound of surplus cotton, every bushel of surplus wheat, and give their notes for it at 20 per cent above the market price if we would sell it to them, and they would make money, too. They could sell it at or below the market price and tell this corporation, "Take your judgment against me if you want to." We will at least be having a good time while we are doing it.

Now, because people in Europe would like to buy more things from us does not mean that there is a demand for those things in any business sense. I think we might as well understand just what is in the minds of some of these gentlemen who originated the proposition in the Norris bill to empower this corporation to buy and sell agricultural products.

It undoubtedly was this: They would have the Secretary of Agriculture, who is a splendid gentleman and who is splendidly fulfilling the duties of his office, and then hope to have the other two members of the board, such men as the chairman of the committee appears to think are the only men who are qualified to deal with questions affecting agriculture, so far as the financing problem is concerned, men, such as he indicated, who milk their own cows and till their own soil, to handle this $600,000,000 corporation. Evidently it is thought it would be a very simple proposition for the proposed Government corporation to use the $600,000,000 in the purchase of agricultural products, own them, and then sell them at any price they saw fit.

I should like to ask some member of the committee who may still be supporting the committee bill or that provision of it which the Senator from Nebraska thinks so valuable, supposing this authority were granted and the corporation had $600,000,000 with which to go out and buy cotton and wheat, what would they do? Would they simply offer the market price for the cotton? If they did, how would the cotton raiser or the producer be benefited if they paid no more than the market price? Is it proposed that they shall pay more than the market price? Evidently that is the assumption; that as soon as the corporation has the $600,000,000 on hand, they will immediately go out and say, "We will pay you 10 or 20 or 30 per cent more for your agricultural products than is the price to-day." That would be a very easy financing proposition, so far as buying is concerned; that, I admit, would raise the price of the product, for a time at least, to the producer; but it would be upon the hands of the Government. What are we going to do with it, then? It is proposed that we sell it abroad and take such securities in payment for it as no business man would take. That is the proposition.

May I say in passing that perhaps the principal mover behind this bill outside of the Senator from Nebraska is one Carl Vrooman, who was Assistant Secretary of Agriculture during the preceding administration. He appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and also appeared the other day before the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry, of which I am a member. He defended the committee bill. I may also say that Mr. Vrooman appears to be one of those farmers who own a great many farms and let them out on a fifty-fifty basis or for a cash rental. He testified before our committee that he was in favor of the committee bill; that he thought that it ought to be passed, even though the Government lost every single dollar of the $1,100,000,000 which was provided for in the original bill. Of course, no one can argue with anyone who believes that the Government should go into this business irrespective of loss. However, that provision has been stricken out of the bill by the committee; it is no longer in the bill even as proposed to be amended by the committee the other day, and the provision is not contained in the substitute which has now been offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. President, I wish to compare the provisions of the two bills which the chairman of the committee has also compared. Let us see which bill is in the real interest of the farmer and which is more likely to benefit him.

I will first observe, Mr. President, that the Senator from Nebraska, when the word "association" is used in his bill, says that includes farmers' cooperative associations, but when the same word is used in the substitute bill, in the same connection and in the same way, he says it does not include farmers' cooperative organizations. Now, let us see what the bill of the Senator from Nebraska would do aside from the authority to buy and sell. It provides that the proposed farmers' export financing corporation may—act as agent of any person producing or dealing in agricultural products, either in their natural or prepared state, within the United States in the exportation and sale of such products.

So far as that provision is concerned, without the corporation using its financial means, merely acting as agent, without power to make advances or to furnish money, it would be of little value, for that is one of the most important functions of any agency. The bill goes on to provide:

And to make advances for the purpose of assisting in financing the exportation of such agricultural products for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, to any person producing such products within the United States, or to any person, Government, or subdivision of Government without the United States purchasing such products—

And so forth. The power to buy and sell having been stricken out in the bill as reported by the Senator from Nebraska, what power is left in the bill? There is left in the bill the power to advance the $600,000,000 for the purpose of aiding in financing exports and authorizing advances to producers, to foreign subjects, and to foreign Governments.

Observe, Senators, that under the bill of the Senator from Nebraska not one dollar could be advanced to any cooperative association of farmers, for cooperative associations of farmers are not engaged in producing agricultural products. It is the individual members who are doing that; as an association it is not producing agricultural products, and not one dollar would be advanced to a producer under the chairman's bill unless that producer were also an exporter.

I asked the chairman of the committee if he knew of a single grain producer in the United States to-day who was an exporter. Senators will remember his reply. He said that, while there may be no producers who are exporters, the producers are forming cooperative associations for the purpose of exporting. I will come to that in just a moment.

There may be some cotton producers who are exporters—I do not happen to know of any—some of the Senators from the Southern States may—but, if there be such, they are the only persons under the bill as it came from the committee who could receive any advances of the money provided for any purpose whatever.

It follows that under the bill as it came from the committee advances under conditions that exist can not and could not be made to any American citizen unless he is both a producer and an exporter. To whom, then, could advances be made? Under his bill no advances could be made to any firm engaged in the exportation of agricultural products or in the marketing of agricultural products unless that firm also produces them. No advances could be made to any bank that has been assisting in the financing of the exportation of agricultural products. So it follows that such loans can not be made at all to American citizens, but they can be made—to whom? They can be made to foreign subjects and to foreign Governments.

I wish to say in passing that I have no particular objection to including the power to make loans, upon adequate security, to foreign buyers. I have such confidence in the War Finance Corporation that I am satisfied such power would not be abused; but, Mr. President, it is surprising, to say the least, to find the chairman of the committee advocating the loaning and providing in a bill for the loaning originally of $1,100,000,000, but now as amended a maximum of $600,000,000, to foreign Governments. That is exactly what his bill does. It is all the more surprising, Mr. President, when one turns to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 11, when the bonus bill was under consideration, and finds that the chairman of the committee offered an amendment to that bill in the following words:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to collect the interest due on the various loans made by the Government of the United States to foreign Governments during the war, and said sum so collected, together with all other interest payments on said loans subsequently collected, is hereby set aside as a separate fund and the same is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

Irrespective of the condition of any foreign country that owes us money, irrespective of their need to use their credit to buy agricultural products produced by American farmers, the chairman of the committee proposed to compel the collection of every dollar of interest that was due, but now he turns around in this bill and proposes to reloan or to give authority to reloan to foreign Governments to the extent of $600,000,000.

It is all the more surprising, too, when one considers the speech of the Senator from Nebraska on this subject a week ago last Tuesday, when he said:

I hope no one will be so selfish as to think that when we find a part of the people of the world failing or starving or out of work because they can not get food, that we ought to let them die for fear if we help them up and get them on their feet they may compete with us afterwards.

Yet it was less than two weeks previously, Mr. President, when the same Senator offered an amendment to the bill to which I have referred compelling the Secretary of the Treasury to collect every dollar of interest that every foreign Government owes to the United States. So under the bill so eloquently championed by the chairman of the committee we find—what? Authority to make advances to any American? No; not for carrying his products for export or otherwise, but advances may be made to foreign Governments and to foreign buyers, creating an additional indebtedness on the part of foreign Governments to the United States.

Now, I want to say just this: I, as one Senator, am opposed to and will oppose making further loans to any foreign Government out of the Treasury of the United States of America.

Mr. RANSEDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. RANSEDELL. Do I understand the Senator to say that the bill—the original bill and the bill as amended by the committee—does not permit advances to citizens of this country, and that it is limited to making advances to foreigners?

Mr. LENROOT. I spoke of the original bill as introduced by the committee and the first amendments. I am not speaking of the substitute bill offered to-day.

Mr. RANSEDELL. No; I am speaking of the original bill with the subsequent amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. RANSEDELL. Now I will ask the Senator if he will not kindly look on page 5 of the original bill as amended, lines 6 and following, which read in this way:

And to make advances for the purpose of assisting in financing the exportation of such agricultural products for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, to any person producing such products within the United States, or to any person, Government, or subdivision of Government without the United States purchasing such products, but in no case shall any of the moneys so advanced be expended without the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the very language I have been discussing.

Mr. RANSEDELL. I understood the Senator to say that no advances could be made to citizens of the United States, but that all of these advances must be made to foreigners.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I said that under this language no advances could be made to any citizen of the United States unless in addition to being a producer he was an exporter of his products.

Mr. RANSEDELL. I will say to the Senator that the language may be faulty, but the committee certainly intended to have these advances made to producers in order that their products might be exported abroad. I do not think the language is ambiguous, because it says "advances * * * to any person producing such products within the United States," or to outsiders. The committee surely intended that these advances of money should be made to people in the United States who produce agricultural products in order that those products might be sent abroad to people who need them, or that the advances should be made to people abroad in order that they might themselves purchase the agricultural products; the idea being, however, as shown by the last few lines, "but in no case shall any of the moneys so advanced be expended without the United States"; that if you advance money to outsiders they must use that money in purchasing products in this country for export. So it seems to me that the money clearly would go to the American producer of agricultural products. That certainly was the intention of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not question but that the proceeds of the loans we may make to foreigners must be expended in the United States. That is true.

Mr. RANSEDELL. For agricultural products.

Mr. LENROOT. For agricultural products; and I do not question the Senator's statement that the committee did not intend any such result as clearly follows from this language; but I am very sure that upon reflection the Senator will see that this language does limit the advances to producers who are also exporters. The purpose of the advance can only be for assisting in financing the exportation, and if a producer is not exporting or does not propose to export his products there is no authority to advance him any money whatever.

Mr. RANSEDELL. May I add that the bill, of course, is to aid in the exportation of farm products, and none of the money would go to an American producer unless he were either an exporter or desired to export these products. He is going to have it done; he will not do it himself, possibly, but will do it through some exporting company or some exporting agency; but he gets the benefit just the same. If the corporation advances money to some bank which in turn will buy his products and export them, or advances the money to some foreigner who in turn will buy his products and export the products, that gives him the benefit. The resultant is that the American producer who now has no market gets his products shipped abroad.

I know that that was the intention of the committee, and if the language is faulty we shall have to correct it.

Mr. LENROOT. Whatever the intention may have been, it is very clear that there would be no authority upon the part of this corporation to advance a dollar to a producer unless that producer satisfied the corporation that he was getting that advance for the purpose of assisting him in exporting the very product that he produced.

Mr. RANSEDELL. Mr. President, I do not want to break into the Senator's speech, but that is just the purpose of the bill, to assist him in exporting, and unless he could show that he was going to export the products that were paid for with the money he ought not to get it.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well; very well. Then I want to ask the Senator how many producers in the United States export their products?

Mr. RANSEDELL. Mr. President, I am unable to answer that question; but there are a great many producers who could employ agents to export their products for them, and they are the people who under the spirit of this act would get the benefit.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, of course the substitute that is now pending, reported from the committee itself, has cured all this, because I understand that while this language is continued in the substitute bill, or a portion of it, it is made clear in other portions of the bill that there will be authority to make advances to anyone dealing in export products, and generally to widen agricultural credits, and I shall refer to that in a moment.

Mr. President, that is all there is of the Norris bill—takes away the power to buy and sell products and this limited power, to which I am sure I have given the proper construction, and if the Norris bill were passed it would result in just one thing: That would be the power to make these enormous loans to foreign Governments and to foreign buyers upon security that no business man would accept, because if he would accept it this medium is not needed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator admit one other thing that it would do—that is, it would fix upon this Government the liability for at least a billion one hundred million dollars.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, it would; and, of course, it is expected that there will be losses here; and there is another reason why this loan to foreign Governments should be stricken out of the committee bill that was introduced this afternoon, and I hope it will be.

If a Government corporation is to be given power to make loans to foreign Governments, what situation are we going to be in? There will be pressure from the representative of every foreign Government in Washington to make a loan to his Government, make loans to one Government and refuse to make loans to another Government, and what is going to be the feeling engendered between the United States and those Governments to whom loans are refused? It is expected that these loans will be made to Governments that may have—though we hope not—the same experience that Russia has had. It is frankly stated that business men will not take the chances involved in the political conditions in some countries in Europe. Well, neither should the United States Government take any such chances. This money belongs to the people of the United States. We have no business to throw away the money of the people of the United States and give it to foreign Governments upon the theory that while they may never pay it back the money, at least, will stay here, and that we will benefit the farmers by using it for that purpose.

Mr. President, the chairman of the committee very severely criticized the substitute bill, especially section 22, because he alleged that it was not permitted to make loans directly to producers. This is the first time, Mr. President, that I have heard it seriously contended by anybody that the Government should make loans directly to producers. The complaint has been always—and this is a financing matter wholly, so far as credits are concerned—that the trouble with the country so far as agriculture is concerned is very largely the frozen credits; that the banks are loaded up to their limit; that the Federal Reserve Board has made such rigid rules with reference to discounts that further credit can not be extended.

I did not suppose anyone would contend that the Government should go into the business directly of loaning to farmers and producers. In fact, I think the Record will show, when the speech of the chairman of the committee is printed, that in response to a question I asked him with regard to the exportation he said in the early part of his speech that he did not contemplate that the Government would loan money directly under his bill or under this bill to producers.

Now, what does this substitute bill do? It provides that advances may be made to any person, firm, corporation, or association dealing in or marketing any agricultural products for the purpose of assisting such person to carry such products until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner, and the Senator from Nebraska very severely criticizes the first part of this section because of the limitations that are there laid down in order to authorize these advances. It can only be done if the board shall be of opinion that conditions arising out of the war, or out of the disruption of foreign trade created by the war, have resulted in or may result in an abnormal surplus accumulation of any staple product of the United States which is normally exported in substantial quantities and that the ordinary banking facilities are inadequate to enable producers of or dealers in such products to carry them until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner, and so forth.

Mr. President, why is that done? The Senator very truly said that section 22 authorizes and encourages hoarding. It does authorize and encourage, under these abnormal conditions, the very thing that during the war we made it a criminal offense to do. It is only because there is such an abnormal condition, such a great emergency affecting agriculture, that this very extraordinary power is warranted now. That these conditions do exist everyone knows. That the conditions are due to these very reasons everyone knows.

That the War Finance Corporation will so hold everyone knows. Then why put it in the legislation? Mr. President, it is a very good thing to have in this legislation, so that in the future, a generation from now perhaps, this legislation shall not be pointed to as being an ordinary, normal function of Government. A reading of the legislation in years to come should disclose that this was only done in the face of a great emergency, and it should be so stated upon the face of the legislation.

The Senator from Nebraska states that no advances can be made except to middlemen, speculators, and profiteers. Mr. President, the language is "to any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in the United States in dealing in or marketing any such products."

That provision is just as broad, Mr. President, as the Senator himself, the chairman of the committee, could write in a bill. If a producer is engaged in marketing his product for export, he is entitled to the benefits of it. If there is a cooperative association of farmers who are engaged in exporting their products they are entitled to the benefit of this bill.

I said in the beginning that the chairman of the committee would give one definition to the word "association" in his bill, and a contrary definition to the word "association" when used in the substitute. The words are the same in both bills, exactly the same. The substitute does provide for the making of advances to any producer if he markets his products for export, and any cooperative association of farmers which markets the products of the members of their association. So that the Senator's criticism of this paragraph absolutely fails.

Then paragraph (b) which he so criticizes provides:

To any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which makes or has made an advance or advances to any such person, firm, corporation, or association as is described in paragraph (a) of this section for the purpose therein set forth.

The Senator criticizes that, and what basis is there for his criticism? Suppose a bank has made advances upon agricultural products for the purpose of assisting in financing their exportation. Is it to the interest of the producer that advances be permitted so that that bank may make further advances for the exportation of these products? It is exactly the same thing which the agricultural bloc, so called, has been contending almost since this session convened, the Federal Reserve Board should have the power to do for the banks just what it is proposed in this paragraph that the War Finance Corporation shall have authority to do.

Then we come to section 24, which the Senator so much criticized; and let me say that the authority granted in section 24 covers a field of credits, a field of advances, that is not covered at all by the bill of the Senator from Nebraska. As was pointed out by the Senator from North Carolina, the bill of the Senator from Nebraska would not be worth one copper penny to any cattle grower in the United States, not a penny to any sheep grower in the United States, not a penny to the producer of any agricultural product in the United States that is not exported.

Mr. President, the benefit to agriculture in this section alone so far outweighs any possible benefit to agriculture under the bill of the Senator from Nebraska, granting for it all that he claims for it, that there is no comparison. Yet the Senator stood here to-day and for more than three hours denounced the provisions of this bill because they did not go further, when his own bill did not go at all.

Mr. President, I did not expect to spend as much time upon this as I have taken. There are some amendments which should be made to this substitute, although I have not had an opportunity to examine it as carefully as I should like. If the substitute does not impose the same limitation upon advances in section 24 that is now imposed in section 22, I shall offer an amendment providing for that limitation.

So far as I have been informed as to the changes made by the committee in this bill and the additions to it, I think I shall be able to support them all, with one exception, and that is as to the power to make loans to foreign governments, and I sincerely hope that before the bill is passed that part of it will be stricken out.

Mr. NELSON. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose an American exporter can sell goods to a foreign government, can sell a lot of wheat, for instance, and the foreign government has not the money to pay for it. Would the Senator prohibit the exporter from taking the securities of that foreign government?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. NELSON. I thought not.

Mr. LENROOT. Not if the American exporter wants to sell to a foreign government and wants to borrow money under the provisions of this bill to assist him in financing the sale. If he wishes to offer as collateral to his own security the bonds of that foreign government, I have no objection whatever to it. But that is not the provision I am objecting to.

Mr. NELSON. With the permission of the Senator, I want to call his attention to the fact that a number of times since the armistice those Governments have bought food products for their people, the Government as a government buying them and distributing them among their own people. That condition may arise in the future, and if the American exporter has a chance to sell to a foreign Government, that foreign Government might not be able to pay the cash but might be able to give bonds as security. Would the Senator prohibit the taking of said bonds?

Mr. LENROOT. I would not prohibit it.

Mr. NELSON. I thought that the Senator said awhile ago that he would not approve a loan to a foreign Government.

Mr. LENROOT. I did; I am opposed to our Government making such loans.

Mr. NELSON. They would make a loan precisely as the loan they contracted before.

Mr. LENROOT. I beg the Senator's pardon. If an exporter chooses to make a loan to a foreign Government, or make advances to a foreign Government, and comes to this War Finance Corporation and asks aid in financing that export, and the War Finance Corporation takes the obligation of the exporter, and the exporter wishes to attach as security the bonds of that other Government, I have no objection. That is not the United States Government making a loan, or any corporation owned by the United States Government making a loan, to any foreign Government, which is what I am objecting to.

Mr. President, there was one other matter which the Senator from Nebraska very severely criticized which I want to spend just a moment or two upon, the last part of section 24, which provides that:

The corporation may, in exceptional cases, upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, purchase from domestic banks, bankers, or trust companies, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other instruments of indebtedness secured by chattel mortgages, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, or other instruments in writing conveying or securing marketable title to staple agricultural products, including live stock.

What does that do? It enables in exceptional instances this War Finance Corporation, where a bank in the West or South has made all the loans it can make, secured by these products, to buy those instruments of indebtedness secured by chattel mortgage, and thus relieve the bank so that it may make further advances to the producer. It enables the War Finance Corporation, therefore, to extend a credit to the producer himself, not exceeding two years, that may save the producer from ruin and bankruptcy.

Yet the chairman of the committee criticizes that, and made the statement that that power would enable this corporation, if it had money enough to buy every security in every bank in the United States, to put the Federal reserve bank out of business.

The Senator must have known that this power is confined to evidences of indebtedness secured by a staple agricultural product. He must have known that this provision was wholly in the interest of agriculture, and if it had not been for the frame of mind that my good friend is in, I believe he would have discussed not only this section but the other provisions of the bill in a very different way from what he has done.

Mr. President, in conclusion, there is altogether too much of a tendency upon the part of some people to arrogate to themselves that they are the only friends of the farmers. The best friends of the farmers of the United States are those who, realizing the great emergency which exists, realizing that the full power of the Federal Government, in so far as it properly can be exercised, should be exercised for their relief, propose to legislate in such a way as will be of real benefit to them and at the same time in accordance with principles that can be sustained in the future. I want to help the farmers, Mr. President, but when they ask for bread I do not want to give them a stone, as is proposed by the original Norris bill.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, at this time I want to pay my respects to House bill 7456.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegge	Heflin	Newberry	Sterling
Broussard	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Swanson
Bursum	Keyes	Oddie	Townsend
Cameron	King	Overman	Trammell
Capper	La Follette	Phipps	Underwood
Caraway	Lenroot	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Curtis	McCumber	Ransdell	Warren
Dillingham	McKellar	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	McKinley	Simmons	Willis
Gerry	McNary	Smith
Gooding	Moses	Smoot
Harris	Nelson	Stanfield

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on official business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is unavoidably detained on account of a slight illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. DIAL, Mr. LADD, and Mr. REED answered to their names when called.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. ERNST, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. BORAH, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. ROBINSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GOODING. Certainly.

HEALTH AND FOOD CONDITIONS IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. McKELLAR. On Tuesday there was a highly sensational article published in the morning paper and sent out, as I understand, by the Associated Press, containing a letter from President Harding. The lurid headlines of the article were as follows:

Asks famine inquiry—Harding calls for Health Service and Red Cross to aid South—100,000 pellagra victims—Health authorities estimate the death toll at 10,000.

I shall not read the entire article, but it seems that the President wrote to the Chief of the Public Health Service and the chief of the Red Cross service, asking their aid in the matter. Among other things, the President said:

I have been greatly concerned to note the public statement from the Public Health Service as to the menace of pellagra and condition of at least semifamine in a large section of the cotton belt.

And again:

Immediate and effective measures of amelioration are manifestly demanded if conditions even approximate the gravity suggested by the Public Health report.

Mr. President, I am sure that President Harding has been misinformed about this matter. In his goodness of heart, he has been misled. I have telegraphed to Tennessee to know if such conditions as the President describes exist in Tennessee. I have a number of telegrams here indicating that they do not exist in my State. I wish to say that in so far as the people of my State are concerned, that the reported is incorrect. Nor are we objects of charity down there. We are greatly obliged to the President for his good intentions, but we surely do not need the services of the Red Cross or any other charitable institution. Times have been hard with us because of inability to sell our products in the last year or two and because of the shortsighted policy of closing European markets against us and because of the high interest rates established, but we are amply able to look after all the distress that may exist among us. We regret that the President has seen fit to look upon us as objects of charity, and that he has seen fit to write letters along this line without, as we can not but believe, sufficient examination and upon insufficient information. On behalf of my State, I wish, respectfully, to ask the President not to include Tennessee in his appeal for Red Cross or other charity. Our people are delighted to contribute to the Red Cross and have done so at all times and will continue to do so, but there is no state of semifamine in our State, and will not be.

I ask that the telegrams to which I have referred may be incorporated in the RECORD, and I thank the Senator from Idaho for allowing me to interrupt him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 27, 1921.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Published statement referred to absolutely incorrect as to conditions here. Statistics of Knoxville and vicinity show six deaths from pellagra to date 1921. Same period 1920 had nine. Food conditions absolutely normal.

WM. R. COCHRANE, M. D.,
Director Department of Health.

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 26, 1921.

Senator K. D. McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our official report to July 1 does not indicate any increase of pellagra. Have wired county health officer for information to-day. Shelby County reports by wire to-day show increase in that county. Expect more pellagra this year than last. No famine in Tennessee and never will be.

OLIN WEST, Secretary.
NASHVILLE, TENN., July 26, 1921.

Senator KENNETH D. McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

One case of pellagra reported to city board of health since January 1, 1921. No truth in the famine report.

W. E. HIBBERT, M. D.,
City Health Officer.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., July 26, 1921.

Senator KENNETH McKELLAR,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

So far as I am able to ascertain, we have not received reports of 20 cases of pellagra in this county. Certainly no more than we have had heretofore. No deaths from this disease. Certainly there are no conditions here to indicate a famine.

E. B. WISE, M. D.,
Director of Health.

MEMPHIS, TENN., July 27, 1921.

Senator KENNETH McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Pellagra deaths city of Memphis, 1918, 32; 1919, 29; 1920, 24; 1921, 9; first 6 months approximately 75 known cases in Memphis at this time, which represents no increase.

J. J. DURRETT, M. D.,
Superintendent Health Department.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. While on this subject, I desire to state that having observed the press dispatch, I wired to the State health service of Florida, and also to the governor of Florida, asking for information. Of course, I was not apprehensive that there was a condition existing in Florida like an epidemic of pellagra or a famine.

I have received a telegram from the State health officer giving the statistics since 1917, showing that there has been a decrease in pellagra in my State continuously since 1917. I have also received a telegram from the governor, stating that there was no condition of famine existing in the State of Florida, but that, on the contrary, Florida, with her variety of resources and strong financial condition, is at present experiencing an era of prosperity. I ask permission to have these telegrams incorporated in the Record.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., July 27, 1921.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I know of no financial distress in any section of this State. On the contrary, Florida, with her variety of resources and strong financial condition, is at present experiencing an era of prosperity.

CARY A. HARDEE, Governor.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., July 27, 1921.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
Washington, D. C.:

Re your telegram. Pellagra in Florida shows decided decrease. Statistics of deaths from 1917: Nineteen seventeen, 218. Nineteen eighteen, 184. Nineteen nineteen, 113. Nineteen twenty, 111. First six months in 1921, 46 deaths.

RAYMOND C. TURCK,
State Health Officer.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to read the headlines from a paper published in the State of South Carolina. It will only take a moment. The headlines read:

Scout famine idea in South Carolina—Slight increase in pellagra cases, officials say—No cause for any alarm—State health department head believes poorer classes in State are affected.

The body of the article goes on to state that the increase is not so great as it was last year, according to State statistics. I do not think it is right to have the report go out that the South is suffering from a case of famine. We are suffering, of course, from a lack of the prosperity with which we have heretofore been blessed in that section, but we are not destitute nor plague stricken.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me just a moment?

Mr. GOODING. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I am glad to hear the statements of the Senators that the article to which they refer is untrue; but I wish to remark that it is not much worse in its character of exaggeration than some of the speeches I have heard on the floor of the Senate. I think any ordinary newspaper man, taking some of these speeches for his text, might have written the particular article without visiting the White House.

ERADICATION OF PINK BOLLWORM.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm, which were, on page 1, line 12, to strike out "available until expended"; and, on page 2, line 3, to strike out "fair rental value" and insert "actual and necessary loss suffered by the owner."

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. GOODING addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time, he said:

Mr. President, the hour is getting late, and I can not finish to-day. I have reached a point where I am going to pay my respects to the Fordney tariff bill, so I will yield the floor, with the understanding that I may resume to-morrow.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I have listened to a large part of the Senator's address, and the more I study the wool schedule of the bill the more I am convinced that the Senator is correct. I again say that the wool schedule and the cotton schedule must have correction or it will be a public scandal.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I shall claim the right to continue when the Senate meets in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Idaho that no right can be given by the Chair for the Senator to continue to-morrow, but that the right is generally conceded by the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

HEALTH AND FOOD CONDITIONS IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, my colleague and I have received a number of telegrams from Georgia, from the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce and many others, protesting against the alarming statements sent out in regard to pellagra and semi-famine conditions in our State. Our people appreciate the President's interest in health conditions in the South. When he was a Member of the Senate I served with him upon the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine and I know he has shown great interest in the health of the people. I remember a bill he offered making a large appropriation to prevent another influenza epidemic. But he has been imposed upon in regard to the pellagra situation in my State.

I ask to have the telegrams, which I send to the desk, printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., July 26, 1921.

Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS.

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We strongly protest published reports of alarming pellagra menace and semifamine condition in cotton belt as unwarranted by the facts and likely to prove another serious blow to the South. Reports to State health board show no increase over last year and no prospect of such menace as indicated. Situation certainly does not justify such adverse comment.

ATLANTA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

TIFTON, GA., July 27, 1921.

Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The sensational newspaper reports regarding famine and the prevalence of pellagra in this section of Georgia is a base fabrication and a slander on the people of this section. When this part of Georgia suffers from a famine the rest of the world will be dead.

TIFTON BOARD OF TRADE,
W. E. ALGEE, Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the editor of the Progressive Farmer, a paper published in my State, which I am going to read:

THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER,
Raleigh, N. C., July 27, 1921.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SIMMONS: It seems to me that you and our other southern Senators ought to expose the alarmists who misled President Harding into giving credence to that fearful falsehood about conditions in the South. The Progressive Farmer has offices in Raleigh, Atlanta, Birmingham, Memphis, and Dallas, and I keep in touch with general conditions in every important section of the South, and I have nowhere heard of conditions that afford any justification for such assertions as the United States Public Health Service has sent out.

As a matter of fact, our farmers have unusually large quantities of food. The 28 per cent decrease in cotton acreage has gone largely into food crops, many of which are already maturing, and it is noted that farmers are bringing larger quantities of food to Raleigh and other sections to market than ever before. The complaint I hear here is not that there is not enough food but that the surplus does not command adequate prices.

President Harding has no doubt spoken with the best intentions, and it would be ungracious not to recognize this fact, but the whole country needs to be informed that what the South wants is not more food but better markets for the food, cotton, and tobacco which we have already produced in abundance.

It seems to me that the United States Senate offers the best pulpit for putting the exact facts before the people, and I hope you will utilize it. If this letter is of any service to you, you may utilize it in any way you wish.

Sincerely, yours,

CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor.

Mr. President, I wish to add to that simply this, that I have no doubt many tenant farmers in the South, on account of the hard times, have been compelled to economize in their expenses both as to food supplies and in other directions; but personally I have heard of no cases of suffering as a result of the lack of the ordinary foods that the people in the different sections of life in my State use.

I do not think there is any justification for the report with reference to underfeeding and famine and disease as a result of these causes existing in my State. I make this statement emphatically, as a result of my knowledge and the information that I have received since the report of the United States Health Service was made public with reference to conditions in the South.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is about to move an executive session?

Mr. CURTIS. I am.

Mr. HARRISON. Will he withhold the motion for just a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, while this matter is before the Senate I desire to say that I agree thoroughly with what the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has said touching the question of pellagra in the South. There has been a slight increase in the spread of the disease in my State over last year, and I presume that is true in other States in the South, but I am sure that the reports are quite exaggerated and that the alarm is not justified.

I had a conference with Dr. Goldberger on yesterday, he being at the head of this work in the Public Health Service here, and he informed me that my State was pretty well organized with reference to information as to pellagra, and that the reports, which are quite correct, show the following condition:

In 1920 in January there were 138 new cases of pellagra in my whole State, while in January of 1921, the present year, there were 143 new cases, a slight increase over last year.

In February of last year there were 201 new cases in the whole State, and in February of this year there were 209 new cases. In March of last year there were 293 cases, and in March of this year, 331 cases. In April of last year there were 432 new cases, and in the same month of this year 638 cases. In May of last year there were 667 new cases, and in May of this year there were 1,817 cases.

Of course, during the summer months the disease, as the facts show, always increases. In June of last year there were 1,022 cases, and in June of this year there were 2,239 cases. In July of last year there were 1,212 cases, and I do not know how many cases there are in the present month of this year. The figures are not yet available. In August last year there were 739 new cases in the State, and in September the number of new cases fell off to 452. In October a further decrease was shown, the number being 323. In November 220, and December last year 178. So you will observe that the number of new cases always shows a decrease from the previous month, beginning in August and continuing to the end of the year. The Public Health officials inform me that nothing can be done by the Congress and that the situation is well in hand.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened:

RECESS.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, July 29, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 28, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, Thou art so mindful of us that not a single day must be given up to fear or to murmurings. Let nothing be done or lost through indifference, but make the mission of the message of Thy mercy stimulate us in the performance of all good works. Teach us that unity of heart, after all, is rather to be chosen than unity of brains. Thus may we cultivate the bondage of fellowship and recognize in others the rights and the privileges vouchsafed unto us through our common fatherhood. Deliver us from every kind of bondage, show us the strength of Thy sacrifice, the beauty of Thy gentleness, the might of Thy condescension, and the dominion of Thy love. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. CYRENUS COLE, Representative-elect from the fifth congressional district of Iowa, be sworn in at this time. The Clerk is in receipt of a telegram that the certificate has been forwarded, although it has not yet reached the office. There is no contest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that Mr. COLE, a Member-elect from the fifth district of Iowa, be sworn in, although the papers have not yet arrived. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CYRENUS COLE appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE REPUBLIC OF PERU.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this is an important anniversary, the one hundredth anniversary of the Republic of Peru. The magnificent bouquet of American Beauty roses now resting on the Speaker's desk is a reminder to the House of this important and happy anniversary. It was presented to an honored Member of this House by Mr. F. A. Pezet, ambassador of the Republic of Peru, and I ask unanimous consent to have read in my time a letter from the ambassador explaining this token of appreciation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

EMBAJADA DEL PERU,
Washington, D. C., July 28, 1921.

MISS ALICE ROBERTSON,
Representative from Oklahoma.

MY DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN: For the first time in the annals of history a lady Representative in the parliament of a great Nation became Speaker pro tempore, the motion under debate being the passage of the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, authorizing the President to appoint a special mission to represent the Government and people of the United States at the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the proclamation of independence in the sister Republic of Peru.

As the representative of the Peruvian Government and nation in this Capital, I wish to express to you on this day my gratification in that the first event of a lady presiding over one of the branches of the Legislature should have coincided with taking of a vote in reference to a participation in my country's celebration. To-day that the Republic of Peru celebrates its hundredth birthday I wish in the name of the Peruvian Government and people to present these flowers to you, bound with the colors of Peru, as a token of our respect and admiration for the great American democracy, the beacon light which guides the other free nations of America.

Very sincerely, yours,

F. A. PEZET,
Ambassador of Peru.

[Applause.]

EXPENSES OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REORGANIZATION.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is House resolution 151, providing for the payment of the salary of the representative of the Executive on the Joint Committee on Reorganization, on which the previous question was ordered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 59, noes 22.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Obviously there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 178, nays 86, answered "present" 1, not voting 166, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask for the announcement of the vote again?

The SPEAKER. The ayes were 174 and the noes 86.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is too bad.

On motion of Mr. IRELAND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to proffer a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand—

Mr. GARNER. If the Chair does not want to recognize me for that purpose, I will not take advantage of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think he ought to recognize the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Very well.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7864) providing for sundry matters affecting the Naval Establishment, and pending that, with the Chair's permission, I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. PADGETT] whether we can not have an agreement upon time for general debate, and I want to say to my colleague the gentleman from Tennessee that I have but one or two gentlemen who would like to talk for a few minutes, and, if agreeable to my colleague, let us fix 40 minutes for general debate and I will yield to any gentlemen who are opposed to the bill or to any gentlemen who are in favor of it.

Mr. PADGETT. That is 20 minutes to a side.

Mr. BUTLER. Twenty minutes to a side.

Mr. PADGETT. I have requests for more time than that.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] would like to have 18 minutes—

Mr. MANN. This is a very important bill and it ought not to be disposed of in 20 minutes to a side by gentlemen both of whom are in favor of it.

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield to any gentlemen who are opposed to it. I do not even care to control the time.

Mr. MANN. No one can better control the time for or against a bill than the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in my opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. I think we can best spend our time—I know it is a very important matter—explaining it section by section. However, I will not make any effort to cut off debate.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me a bill like that, with 10 sections, if it has that many—

Mr. BUTLER. And there will be another one proposed.

Mr. MANN. All on different matters, ought to be explained to the House before we go into the bill for amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will suggest the time, I will make an effort—

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, any one of the first sections of the bill by itself will certainly demand an hour on a side, but the other sections of the bill which I have read I do not understand, and I do not know what they mean. I may be in favor of them or I may be opposed to them; but I do not know, and I would like to have them explained so I will know.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate fully the situation in which the gentleman from Illinois finds himself, and I want to say this: I spent seven half days earnestly endeavoring to understand all about this bill and I am almost afraid to undertake to explain it, because gentlemen may ask some questions which I can not answer. We have experts here and they have made a synopsis of this bill, prepared it so every gentleman of this House may have an opportunity to read it and endeavor to ascertain what these provisions mean, so that they may with intelligence ask questions of those of us who are supposed to understand it.

Mr. MANN. Where is the synopsis—in the report?

Mr. BUTLER. The report is very full—

Mr. MANN. I read the report, and here is the bill up for consideration. Now the gentleman suggests that they have something new that explains the bill. If that is the case, the bill ought to go over for a day and give us an opportunity to read it.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to my friend the synopsis is plain, short, and sets out an explanation of what these different sections mean. It is only an enlargement of the report.

Mr. MANN. I have read the bill and have read the report. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the bill does.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, is there objection to the 40 minutes?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. Will objection be made to one hour?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I give notice that at the proper time I will move that the committee rise after I have explained the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7864.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7864) providing for sundry matters affecting the Naval Establishment, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7864) providing for sundry matters affecting the Naval Establishment.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized and directed to receive and investigate claims, submitted under oath and filed with the Navy Department within 60 days from the passage of this act, looking to reimbursement of contractors, through appropriations to be made by Congress for that purpose, upon estimates furnished by the Secretary from time to time, for actual losses under fixed-price contracts occurring after April 6, 1917, but not including losses of anticipated profits, which actual losses have been brought about by the action of Government agencies, sovereign or otherwise, and not by the fault or negligence of the contractor, after the date upon which such contracts were entered into and which have arisen under contracts made between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, or under contracts which were entered into before and were due for completion after April 6, 1917, either by the terms of the contracts or authorized extensions thereof, but no such claim shall be received or investigated unless the claimant shall file with the Secretary of the Navy an affidavit in writing that he did not make a net profit of 6 per cent on the entire volume of his business with or for the United States Government upon contracts entered into during the period between April 6, 1917, and June 30, 1919, or that were entered into before and were due for completion after April 6, 1917, either by the terms of the contracts or authorized extensions thereof: Provided, That "net profits" hereunder shall be ascertained as provided in section 302 of the revenue act approved September 8, 1916: Provided further, That the amount of compensation to be paid by the Government to any such contractor for his losses shall not increase his net profit on the entire volume of such business above 6 per cent.

The Secretary shall reject claims for losses arising from loss or cancellation of commercial business resulting from mandatory orders placed by the Navy Department or from fixed-price contracts made by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy voluntarily entered into with the Navy Department; and claims based upon any contract or order modified or canceled in whole or in part, the terms of which modification or cancellation shall have been agreed upon by the parties to the contract since November 11, 1918; but execution of a final voucher or release under the provisions of a contract shall not bar the claimant from relief under this act if he is otherwise entitled thereto. In case the performance of the contract by any contractor as contemplated herein is not completed prior to the passage of this act the claimant may file a preliminary claim within 60 days after the passage hereof and may thereafter, within 30 days after the completion of work under such contract, file final claim.

SEC. 2. The word "contractors" shall be deemed to include subcontractors and material men who may present their claims either directly to the Secretary of the Navy or through their respective contractors. The Secretary of the Navy, for the purposes of this investigation, shall have the right to summon witnesses and examine them under oath, acting either in person or through such agencies as he may establish, and may require the claimant to exhibit his books and papers, and may, within his discretion, submit affidavits of the claimant to the Secretary of the Treasury to be compared with income-tax or other returns from the affiant on file in the Treasury Department, and whenever it shall be found by the Secretary of the Treasury that there is a discrepancy he shall notify the Secretary of the Navy that the affidavit appears to be insufficient, and whenever the discrepancy appears to be of such nature as to warrant such action shall make the necessary reference to the Department of Justice.

SEC. 2a. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust and determine the amount equitably and justly due to any contractor under a formal contract executed by the Secretary or under his authority, which amount is in addition to or an element of the consideration named in such contract, where such amount has been expended by the contractor in accordance with any written agreement, whether in statutory form or not, or on the faith of any written promise of reimbursement, authorization, or order, when said agreement, authorization, promise, or order was made by the Secretary of the Navy or under his authority in connection with the performance of such formal contract and was made because of the exigencies arising out of the war; and such adjustment and determination shall be conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Government, and the amount thus found shall be paid from any appropriation available therefor. In case there is no appropriation available for such payment the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress his findings and recommendations in relation thereto.

Sec. 2b. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, as an incident to the relief contemplated by this act, to waive, mitigate, or remit liquidated damages for delays in completion of contracts, deducted under the provisions of contracts falling within the scope of this act, in those cases and to the extent that such delay is ascertained to be due to the causes specified in section 1 of this act, and he is authorized to prescribe regulations for the purpose of carrying this provision into effect.

Sec. 2c. That an appropriation is hereby authorized, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, of a sum not exceeding $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of the expenses of the investigations authorized by the foregoing provisions of this act, including such additional clerical and technical assistants as the Secretary of the Navy may see proper to employ.

Sec. 3. That all men transferred from the Regular Navy to the Fleet Naval Reserve, who have heretofore reenlisted or may hereafter reenlist in the Navy, shall, from the date of reenlistment, be credited with pay at the same rate, exclusive of retainer pay, that they were receiving when on active duty in the Navy as members of the Fleet Naval Reserve prior to date of reenlistment in the Navy, and shall be required to serve under their reenlistment only such time as added to the time served in the enlistment in which serving when transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve and the time of active service in the Navy while members of the Fleet Naval Reserve shall equal four years, when they shall be entitled to be discharged by reason of expiration of enlistment.

That any enlisted man of the Navy or Marine Corps who has been discharged to enable him to be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force or Marine Corps Reserve as a commissioned or warrant officer, and who has heretofore reenlisted in the Navy or who may hereafter reenlist in the Navy within four months from the date of termination of his service as an officer in the Naval Reserve Force or Marine Corps Reserve, shall be restored to the grade, rank, or rating held by him at time of discharge from the Navy to permit enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force or Marine Corps Reserve, and he shall be entitled from the date he has heretofore so reenlisted, or may hereafter reenlist, to the same rate of pay, including subsequent increases therein, as he was receiving at time of discharge from the Navy to permit enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force, and shall be required to serve under such reenlistment only for such time as, added to the unexpired portion of the enlistment from which discharged and his active service in the Naval Reserve Force, shall equal four years, when he shall be entitled to be discharged by reason of expiration of enlistment.

That any member of the Fleet Naval Reserve, transferred thereto after 16 or 20 years' service in the Navy, who has heretofore been discharged therefrom to accept temporary appointment as an officer in the Regular Navy shall, upon the revocation of temporary appointment as an officer, be deemed to have reverted to his former status in the Fleet Naval Reserve, and shall be entitled to retainer pay at the same rate he was receiving prior to discharge from the Fleet Naval Reserve from the date he is herein deemed to have reverted to his former status therein: Provided, That reenlistment in the Navy following revocation of temporary appointment as an officer shall not deprive him of the benefits of this section, and he shall be entitled to receive the pay, including retainer pay, authorized for members of the Fleet Naval Reserve when on active duty during the period served under enlistment.

That enlisted men of the Navy who were discharged at expiration of enlistment and had completed 16 or 20 years' service at time of discharge, and were thereafter enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force and assigned provisional rank as warrant or commissioned officers, shall be deemed to have been transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve on date of discharge from the Navy and then to have been transferred to the class of the Naval Reserve Force in which they were given provisional assignment as warrant or commissioned officers: Provided, That they shall be entitled to receive the same pay, allowances, and other benefits from and after the date said transfer to the Fleet Naval Reserve is herein deemed to have been made as is provided by law for men transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve.

That any enlisted man who was discharged from the Navy to enable him to be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force in a commissioned rank, who was thereafter at his own request reduced to the same rating in the Naval Reserve Force as held by him at the time of his discharge from the Navy, and transferred to the Regular Navy to serve the unexpired portion of his enrollment, in accordance with the act approved July 11, 1919, shall be entitled, from the date he was so transferred and so long as he shall continue in the naval service, to the same rate of pay and other benefits that would have been received by him if he had not been discharged from the Navy to permit enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force.

Sec. 4. That the Secretary of the Navy shall establish the rates of base pay for enlisted men serving in the insular force of the Navy: Provided, That such rates of pay shall not exceed one-half the rates of base pay of the enlisted men of the Navy in the same or similar ratings.

Sec. 5. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to cause to be prepared in the Office of Naval Operations, Navy Department, a publication known as the Shipping Bulletin, and to publish and furnish the same to the maritime interests of the United States and other interested parties at the cost of collecting and publishing the information, including the cost of printing and paper and other necessary expenses. The expenses of such bulletin shall be paid from the appropriation "Engineering," Bureau of Engineering. The money received from the sale of such publication shall be credited to appropriation "Engineering."

Sec. 6. That the naval appropriation act approved June 4, 1920, is hereby amended so that any chaplain in the Naval Reserve Force who was more than 50 years of age on the date of said act and who now holds the confirmed rank of commander may be transferred to and appointed in the same permanent grade and rank in the Regular Navy not in the line of promotion and not eligible for retirement: Provided, That any chaplain transferred to the Regular Navy in accordance with this authorization shall be wholly retired without pay upon attaining the age of 64 years or becoming physically incapacitated for active duty: Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall operate to increase the number of chaplains with the rank of commander as now authorized by law.

Sec. 7. That in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the President that a commissioned or warrant officer or an enlisted man with the charge of desertion now standing against him on the rolls and records of the Navy or Marine Corps has since such charge was entered served honorably in the war with the German Government, either in the military forces of the Allies or in other branches of the military service of the United States prior to November 11, 1918, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to cause an entry to be made on said rolls and records of the Navy or Marine Corps, relieving said officer or enlisted man of all the disabilities which he had heretofore or would hereafter suffer by virtue of said charge of desertion thus appearing against him; and upon such action being taken by the President such officer or enlisted man shall be regarded as having been honorably discharged on the date the charge of desertion was entered against him: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall operate to entitle said officer or enlisted man to back pay or allowances of any kind.

Sec. 8. That all retired commissioned and warrant officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps who served on active duty in the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States during the war with Germany shall be credited with all active duty performed since retirement during the period from April 6, 1917, to March 3, 1921, in the computation of their longevity pay.

Sec. 9. That the accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to allow in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers of the Navy and Marine Corps payments made by them for civilian outfits furnished enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps upon discharge for bad conduct, undesirability, or inaptitude since November 13, 1917.

Sec. 10. That the limits of cost heretofore authorized and below enumerated are increased as follows: Battleship No. 44, from $12,750,000 to $14,750,000; battleship No. 46, from $15,000,000 to $17,000,000; submarine No. 119 to submarine No. 122, both inclusive, each from $1,750,000 to $1,990,000.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 11, line 17, strike out "$1,925,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,990,000."

During the reading the following occurred:

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to ask unanimous consent that we may dispense with the first reading of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to present that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk concluded the reading.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that I am entitled to one hour. I yield 10 minutes of that hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there have been considerable hearings extending over a period of a year and a half to two years on this so-called contractors' relief bill. The bill has been unanimously reported twice by the Committee on Naval Affairs. I realize that at this season of the year most men are heated and impetuous and are inclined to believe that contractors generally have made barrels of money, and therefore are inclined to feel adversely to any bill that may come before the House for the relief of contractors who have been working for the Navy Department. Yet, gentlemen, contractors who operated under the Treasury Department, under buildings and grounds, and under the War Department, have been settled with for claims that do not compare in the slightest degree with the claims of the various contractors now pending before the Navy Department.

This bill, I believe, has woven about it every safeguard for the National Treasury. It does not give contractors a special legal status. It provides particularly that where a contractor has made 6 per cent on all of his Government work, from any governmental agency, he is entitled to no redress for loss sustained through governmental action.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Suppose a contractor made one-half of 1 per cent profit, he would not have suffered loss, which goes without saying. Would that man have a right to file a claim?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. He would only have the right to file a claim for a loss or a damage that was sustained through governmental action direct. In other words, we have had cases like this: A contractor was building a tug and he had his mechanical equipment ready for installation, when some governmental agency comes along with a priority order and takes that mechanical equipment out of this man's yard. Of course, he has to get additional mechanical equipment, and it may take him 30, 60, or 90 days to get it.

Under the decision of the comptroller the Navy Department could not extend the time for the completion of that contract and had to assess liquidated damages. Of course, there is no one in the House who will say that is fair or even desired. Among men that would not be fair. We have another case—and there are numberless cases—where a contractor was building a magazine at about the time we went into the war. We got into the war, and the bolsheviks and the I. W. W.'s were blowing up buildings and railroads and bridges, and that contractor was notified by the Secretary of the Navy to build a certain kind of fence around those magazines for the protection of Government property. His bill for extras under that supplemental agreement might have been $6,000 or $7,000 for that fence. It was a valid claim against anybody excepting the United States. But the comptroller says the Government got nothing in addition to its original contract; that the fence might have been put there by the contractor for his own protection. There was a lack of consideration in the order or in the supplemental agreement, and the gentleman, of course, lost $6,000 or $7,000. Among men that contract would be good. There are supplemental agreements that are signed by the Secretary of the Navy or by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, or the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair on the one hand, and the contractor on the other. The contractor was led to assume that he had a legal contract, but because of lack of proper consideration in the supplemental agreement the comptroller says the Navy Department can not pay it, and the contractor has suffered a loss.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman understands that under this bill the finding of the Secretary does not constitute a legal obligation against the Government on which suit can be filed in the Court of Claims, but is simply a recommendation to Congress that an appropriation be made.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the committee object to a proviso to make that clear?

Mr. BRITTEN. The committee thought that that was clear, but if it is not, we would be glad to have the gentleman's amendment making it particularly clear. Let me suggest to gentlemen that claims of this kind can not go into the Court of Claims. Their only redress is Congress, and section 1 of the bill merely authorizes the Secretary to receive claims, investigate them, and report to Congress, when Congress will make appropriation. That is the only redress the contractor has. He has no other on earth, I am told.

Mr. BRIGGS. Can he not do that now? Can he not ask the Secretary of the Navy for a report on the claim, as in other cases?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. The Committee on Claims has not done that.

Mr. BRIGGS. Can it not do it?

Mr. BRITTEN. That is exactly what the legislation is going to provide, and the claim will be where it belongs, in the Navy Department and in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BRIGGS. It will go through the Committee on Claims?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; through the Committee on Appropriations, in the usual way, with an appropriation for a specific purpose.

Mr. BRIGGS. It does not go through the Committee on Claims at all?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. I do not think that the Committee on Claims is as qualified to pass upon these claims as the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Navy Department itself.

Mr. BRIGGS. The Committee on Appropriations, as I understand it, now makes appropriations that the Committee on Claims authorizes?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; and it makes appropriations for the Navy Department, just as the Committee on Naval Affairs formerly did. We thought it was wise to give these contractors relief, many of whom are bankrupt or on the verge of bankruptcy. The only redress of this kind is through the action of Congress.

Mr. BRIGGS. This will substitute the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy for the judgment of the Committee on Claims?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; and final action by Congress. There is no other way to get the money.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Are these claimants now under the law of such standing as would entitle them to go to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BRITTEN. No.

Mr. WALSH. Then what sort of legal claims do they have? Is this another attempt to settle claims upon an equitable basis?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; you may put it that way.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the instance he cited, where the fence is built by the contractor, that among business men there would be any right to bring a suit for such a claim as that?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, yes; I do; among men.

Mr. WALSH. Then if there is a right among business men, why is there not a right to bring that claim into the Court of Claims?

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no such right.

Mr. WALSH. I have my doubts about that.

Mr. BRITTEN. They have no right to go into the Court of Claims.

Mr. WALSH. If that is the only information we have—

Mr. BRITTEN. There are gentlemen on the floor who can explain that.

Mr. WALSH. I do not care where he is, or who he may be. I have my doubts about that particular information. A claim that between business men would entitle one of them to bring suit as the result of a contract—why they can not under the existing law get into the Court of Claims as the result of a contractual obligation with the Government—

Mr. BRITTEN. That was my impression.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, may I have more time?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that his line of thought is in complete accord with my own, and I asked that very question yesterday of the expert from the solicitor's office, and he says the only redress the contractor has is by an act of Congress and by a special appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the expert from the solicitor's office was on the floor of the House?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; he was acting as the committee clerk.

Mr. WALSH. Who is the other gentleman sitting by him?

Mr. BRITTEN. He is the assistant from the Judge Advocate General's office.

Mr. WALSH. Then one or the other of them is here without authority. But I have no objection to their being here.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts objects to one or the other of these gentlemen being here, they will retire.

Mr. WALSH. I do not object.

Mr. BUTLER. I asked them to be here, so that they might furnish members of the committee with correct information. I have stated that on some points I am unable to give the information desired, and I do not want to make a misstatement. We asked the gentlemen to come here.

Mr. WALSH. I am trying to get my information from a member of the committee, and some member ought to have the information.

Mr. BRITTEN. Some of the members of the committee have it.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the fact that the chairman of the committee has a lot of work to do, and that he can not necessarily be familiar with all the details; but some member of the committee ought to be.

Mr. BRITTEN. Some member of the committee probably is.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the gentleman if he has made any further investigation about the question I propounded, about the matter of building a fence, making a contractual obligation?

Mr. BRITTEN. The comptroller and best authority in the Navy Department say the contractor's only relief is in Congress.

Mr. WALSH. I do not understand some of the provisions of this bill. Has the committee got a list of the claimants? Does it know how many of these claims there are?

Mr. BRITTEN. We have a list, but in all fairness and frankness I will say to the gentleman that I do not think that list is complete. It is impossible to determine the number of claimants that may file claims within 60 days after the passage of this act.

Mr. WALSH. How much do the pending claims amount to?

Mr. BRITTEN. The pending claims amount to about $4,000,000 or $5,000,000. But in a way they are not claims; a greater portion of them are not claims in the usual definition of the word. Sixty per cent of the claims under this bill will be for the return of liquidated damages assessed by the department, against the will of the department, where some governmental agency came along and stopped a man's work and took his material from him. In the case of a Navy Department contractor having his cement on the dock, a War Department officer came along and took his cement away from him, and the Navy Department had to assess liquidated damages for delay. The cement was needed more in France than at Norfolk. Of course the contractor had no voice in the matter whatever. But there are hundreds of smaller cases where liquidated damages were assessed where the Government came in and took possession of a man's plant and later gave him a voucher in full for his money. When the voucher was received by the comptroller for his O. K. or approval, he disapproved it, hecause, he said, the bureau chief had no authority to waive the liquidated damages under the law. This bill is intended to remedy that.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman know that in the case he has mentioned, where the Government agent comes and takes the contractor's cement away from him, it is like the case of an individual?

Mr. BRITTEN. My good friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says the contractor can go into the Court of Claims. Gentlemen, do we want to send contractors into the Court of Claims to get payment when the Government itself desires to pay them? The Navy Department desires to waive these liquidated damages. It has shown its disposition to waive liquidated damages by having given the contractors vouchers in full. No appropriation is necessary, because the Navy Department has the money on hand for the completion of certain contracts. It desires to pay the contractors, but the comptroller says to the Secretary of the Navy, "You can not pay these men." Surely we do not want to drive them into the Court of Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. That is exactly what this House decided the other day by an overwhelming vote, that we want these men to go into the Court of Claims and have their claims properly adjudicated with a Government attorney there to pass upon the Government side of it and a Government judge to pass on the merits of the case.

Mr. BRITTEN. Let me suggest to my good friend that I think the Secretary of the Navy and his staff are better qualified to pass on these claims than is any Court of Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], if he desires the time.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to talk about a matter foreign to this bill. I believe, under the rules, that is permissible. I think every Member of this House ought to be interested when the rights and privileges of the House are infringed upon or neglected by its membership.

In this morning's paper, in an Associated Press report, in the authentic organ of the administration we find this statement, referring to the program outlined by the secret conference held at the White House by 14 Senators and the President of the United States. Just why it should have been secret I do not know; but evidently the Senators thought after the conference that its results should not be kept secret, and we have what purports to be the result of that conference. Among other things is this:

The program was said to leave the tariff bill subject to indefinite delay, possibly until the winter session of Congress, although some Senate leaders reiterated that it would be enacted before adjournment of the present extra session.

Does that sound familiar, gentlemen? Do you recall anything I said during the consideration of that bill which indicated that this program would be carried out?

Although some Senate leaders reported that it would be enacted before adjournment of the present extra session.

We also have this statement:

President Harding told the Senators, it was said, that he was assured by House leaders of speedy passage of a tax revision bill. It is planned to incorporate tax changes recommended recently by the Treasury Department and rush the bill through, leaving most other revision to the Senate.

Now, gentlemen, what I rose for was to protest against that program and that procedure in the House of Representatives. You will recall how we rushed through the tariff bill without an opportunity of offering an amendment. You will recall also that the program with reference to internal-tax revision was outlined by the Treasury Department on April 11, 1921. Now, I want to suggest to you Republicans, if you want to continue to be worthy of the name of this House, if you want the House to continue to be worthy of the name of the membership of the House, that you assert your prerogatives and see that the tax laws that pass this body are thoroughly considered and are the views of the American people. [Applause.] Just why you are willing to have your colleagues of the Ways and Means Committee stultify themselves—because that is what it means when they permit a bill to go through this House without thorough consideration, with a view of having it revised and made perfect at the other end of the Capitol—I am unable to understand. I can not understand why you should be willing to do that. It is a stultification of their duties and it is a neglect of the constitutional requirements and a reflection on the House of Representatives. Let us see whether that program is justifiable. In the same paper, by the Associated Press, under an article headed "Speed tax hearings to permit recess," we find this statement referring to the Ways and Means Committee:

Some leaders hope to put the bill through in a few days after its formal presentation, but plans for handling it in the House have not been fully shaped up. The general procedure is expected by committee members to be similar to that adopted with relation to the Fordney tariff bill—a Republican caucus to consider the measure and the adoption by the House of a rule to limit debate and shut off general amendments.

Gentlemen, I am going to tell you Republicans what they are going to offer you, and see whether you are willing to take it without an opportunity of repealing other taxes. They are going to offer you a bill repealing the excess-profits tax. They are going to offer you a bill cutting down the surtaxes to four or five brackets, with a limitation of 25 to 35 per cent. They are going to increase your corporation taxes, and then they are going to let it rest. Not another tax probably will be included in that bill, and you gentlemen on the Republican side are expected to take that bill and depend upon the United States Senate to correct your misdeeds or neglect of the interests of the American people and of your duty as required by the Constitution. As a Member of this House I want to protest, and as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, a committee that has stood out for a century as the leading committee of the House, I want to protest against its subordinating its powers and its rights and privileges and duties to the United States Senate. [Applause.] I say to the present Chairman of the Committee of the Whole [Mr. LONGWORTH] that if he expects to make the Committee on Ways and Means what it has been for many years, if he expects to retain the power that he has as a member of that committee, he must cease the procedure that he has adopted with reference to the tariff bill and give this House an opportunity to legislate on internal tax matters. [Applause.]

You continue to adopt the method adopted in the consideration of the tariff bill, presenting amendments, preventing an opportunity to consider the bill, taking for granted the judgment and wisdom of the Ways and Means Committee, when it has been stated in the public press that they have surrendered their judgment, surrendered their own prerogatives of making the bill and sending it to the United States Senate without thorough consideration. What are we going to do? The Republican membership of the Ways and Means Committee will meet in secret, as they did at the White House, a secret conference of 14 Senators—and, by the way, I have seen that they have sent for some Members of the House; I presume Dr. MONDELL and Dr. FESS and two or three other doctors, who will be there to-night at the White House dinner, and they only give them seats for 12, whereas they gave the Senate 14, and I protest against that. [Laughter.] I do not think they should cut down the number of the House Members, but give them at least a representation in proportion to the representation in the number of Members of the House and the Senate.

What will they do? You Republicans will not be there, except a dozen or so, and they will fix up a program, arrange the internal revenue to collect $4,000,000,000, bring it back, and in a secret conference of the Ways and Means Committee prepare the bill, bring it in here, and say, "This is what we have decided upon and what you have got to put through." Gentlemen, you have got the majority, and you can do as you please, but I arose to protest against such a procedure in the House of Representatives on the part of the Republicans. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, after a great deal of labor and a desire to do justice between the Government and men, covering a period of six or eight months, we concluded to report this bill for the consideration of the House. Personally it matters not one bit what you may do with it, strike out the enacting clause or adopt what appears to you to be the more desirable sections—10 of them in number. Three of the sections, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] covered in his remarks, are what is known to us of the committee as the contractors' bill, had the unanimous vote of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. ROSE. I want to know whether the passage of this bill would make it possible for a contractor who actually lost money by reason of failure to procure materials and employ labor at prices obtaining at the time his bid was submitted to now present his claim and instead of suffering a loss be awarded a 6 per cent profit on his contract?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman permit one other question? Section 7 provides that in a case of desertion charged against an officer the President is given authority to remove the disability. Under the present law can the President remove the disability of any soldier of the Civil War? All such disabilities are now under the authority of Congress, and I oppose the delegation of such power to any individual.

Mr. BUTLER. Only when authorized by Congress. If we reach that section of the bill I shall be delighted to take the floor and explain to my friend, the best I know how, its provisions.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rose], this section merely intends to remove a charge of desertion against the record of a man which occurred prior to our participation in the war. A young fellow in the Navy was alluringly promised certain things in the service, saw pictures of Hawaiian girls, and he went into the Navy expecting to get action, but he deserted when the European war broke out and joined the Canadian or British forces. We are waiving the charge of desertion.

Mr. ROSE. In the Civil War, where a man was charged with desertion, if he wanted to get relief he had to come to Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. My nature is very good this morning and I do not propose to work hard, but I would like to have an opportunity to explain for two or three minutes several of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. PADGETT. A question was asked about this profit of the contractor. The bill does not guarantee any profit whatever. This provision in the bill as to contractors is a limitation on the opportunity to get consideration of his case. For illustration, a man has two contracts, on one he lost and on the other he made a profit. Now, combining the two, if he gets as much as 6 per cent profit on the two he could not get any consideration of his case at all of the contract where he lost. But if he made less than 6 per cent on the total contracts he can get consideration of the contract where he made a loss and his compensation is limited not to exceed 6 per cent on all of his contracts.

Mr. SEARS. Suppose a man makes 50 per cent on both contracts by efficient management, as I understand the gentleman, the Government gets nothing back, but if a man, even through inefficient management, loses on his contract, he is reimbursed.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield, but I am not sure that I can answer all these questions put to me, especially those questions directed at a sentence that contains 240 words.

Mr. HUSTED. I find on page 3, line 7, there is a provision for the execution of the final voucher or relief, and that a provision of the contract shall not bar the claimant for relief. In other words, if a man gets a final release entered into voluntarily, that is disregarded.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad the gentleman has directed my attention to that. Some of these contractors were hard driven. They had to have money or else fail. They did make settlements with the Navy Department. On some of these vouchers there is a privilege given that they may renew their demands later, if Congress authorizes the claim for further compensation. There are other cases where the vouchers are complete, where there is a full surrender of rights. Those receipts and releases were taken from contractors under the same condition—men who claim to have been driven to it. Whether or not in equity they would be relieved under the condition, I do not know. That is for a chancellor to determine, but here we have written into the bill an authority for relief, the Secretary of the Navy to be the judge, because there must be some one, some tribunal, to determine whether or not the man who signs the final release did it under such pressure that in equity he ought to be relieved from its consequences.

Mr. HUSTED. In order to get part of the money due him, was he compelled to execute a release for all of the money?

Mr. BUTLER. In some instances, I would say to the gentleman from New York, he was; a result which has brought about a great deal of distress in cases that we know of. Therefore we have asked the House to consider the propriety of submitting the question of relief to the Secretary of the Navy, and to such as he may bring into assistance with him, to determine whether or not there should be relief given.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that under general law anyone who is prompted by coercion or fraud to sign an instrument can be relieved on that ground without any additional legislation?

Mr. BUTLER. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That being true, is it intended to relieve business men from contracts into which they entered in order to get the money at that particular time? Is not that the same motive that very frequently enters into compromises between individuals?

Mr. BUTLER. My friend and I know that that element oftentimes enters into an agreement which men make. They may be driven to it, forced to it under stress of circumstances. The settling officer said, "give this receipt in full," and whether or not in equity they can be relieved I can not say, but what we ask the Congress to do is to permit the question to be submitted to the Secretary of the Navy to determine.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not that provision make simply a scrap of paper out of all of the settlements that have been made?

Mr. BUTLER. I think not. It was not so considered by us.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. I would like the views of the chairman of this committee in respect to the accuracy of the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. I am interested in that proposition, and I want to know if what he said is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not hear all that the gentleman from Tennessee said, but knowing my colleague for 20 years, and knowing his extreme care in statements on questions of legislation, I think the gentleman may rely upon the accuracy of the statement that he made.

Mr. BEEDY. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to state that if a contractor had two different jobs with the Government, on one of which he made 3 per cent and on another of which he lost money, that he could join the two, and if on the two he could show that he had not made 6 per cent, he might, if this bill were enacted, come in and be recouped. Is that correct?

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a suggestion?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I shall endeavor to answer the question. What did the gentleman from Tennessee say?

Mr. PADGETT. I stated distinctly that it does not give any profits whatever. This only seeks to make good losses, and if upon his contract he made $1 of profit, the Government does not make good anything, but if he made less than 6 per cent on all of his business, he has a right to come in and have consideration given to his contract on which he claims a loss to see whether or not he had a loss on this contract.

Mr. WYANT and several Members rose.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, I must insist that I be secured in my rights. The hour will soon go by, and I have not yet touched the part of the bill which I desire to speak on. Gentlemen who will remain in this House for 25 years will finally realize the importance of closing out business that is presented to them while they are living and not bequeathing it to their descendants. Claims of some sort are being presented every day against this Government, growing out of the Great War of 1861 to 1865, and now, while we are all alive, while Secretary Daniels is living, while his chiefs of bureaus are living, while the accounting officers are living, while these contractors are living, let us give authority to some one or some department to investigate and determine what the Congress ought to do, or have them submit to the Congress the wishes of the department on the subject of adjustment. Obtain the facts now and settle what we owe our just creditors.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It is my understanding that the provisions of the bill for the payment of losses refer only to those losses occasioned by the action of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In preventing proper execution of the contract and not under the contract.

Mr. BUTLER. That is correct. There is a statute requiring the observance of certain formalities when making a contract with the Navy. The contract must be in writing. I recall a time when I went to the Secretary of the Navy, when the recent war was about to break on us, when I was feverish and hot, because I feared lest something we should do would be kept undone that would protect the lives of our children who would reach the battle fields. It was then I asked him to hasten the construction of the great ship Idaho, in order that she might be ready to go to sea as soon as possible. He telegraphed to the works at Camden, N. J., to hasten the construction of the ship, authorizing its builders to put upon the ship three shifts of men at eight hours a shift, to employ all sorts of labor, to cover every available space of the boat with men in order to get the ship to sea a year ahead of the time when the builders had contracted to complete her.

They are out of pocket between two and three million dollars, and unless the Congress says that they shall be paid for this extra labor cost not one dollar will they recover. I feel myself partly responsible for urging this hastened completion—listen, gentlemen of the House—because the comptroller held that the authority to advance these ships was not in writing, as prescribed by the act of Congress, no recovery can be had. All work was rushed on and on and on in an effort to get ready for this war. Now, it is found that a few million dollars, perhaps five to seven million, will close out all of these losses. It will not enrich any one, and in order that you may understand my personal feeling I am ready to vote to take the great profits from the men who made them during the war and pay the debts of this great Government, for I have a feeling of dislike for the selfish profiteer. I am almost afraid to say even though his claim might be just and I would be suspicious of his demands. In case of the Idaho and as in the case of some of the submarines it does seem to me, and these people are not my constituents, I know them not at all, but, my friends, it does seem to me that it is not fair dealing between them and the Government that they should be deprived of the money they expended under the direction of the Government. It is only a formality that stands in their way. This money can be taken from the decrease to the Navy. Before we are through perhaps a motion may be made to reduce it further, but these debts that are owing by the Government to these people should be paid, but no profits should be paid. We have surrounded this bill by what we think is every protection that will safeguard the Government. We have further provided that these men who made huge profits shall not in any way break through and recover from the Government. That is not intended, and we believe we have guarded safely against it. To repeat what I said at first—Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left? I can not take all the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has until three minutes of two o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to yield to other gentlemen. Here is my friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I do.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as chairman of the committee, can probably give as much information as anyone, and I would like to ask him one question.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman can do that.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether or not under this bill the New York Ship Building Co., who was represented by Mr. Humphreys at your hearing, and which company has had contract for building the Saratoga, which will not be completed for several years yet according to his testimony, whether or not it will have the right to come in for the time between April 6, 1917, and the other time limit fixed by this bill and figure profits and losses during that block, and then come on and finish the contract, and, as Mr. BRITTON, a member of the committee, suggested, might make $200,000 on the completion of the contract. Do you propose to let that company come in and get payments on losses during that period under this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Now, let me endeavor to answer that question. I have nothing to evade, but it is with great difficulty I answer because of my ignorance. We fix the date as subsequent to the armistice, six months, for the advantage of the Government, that it might include that time in order to determine whether or not there are any losses. I want to say this New York shipbuilding concern at Camden had a contract prior to the war for the construction of ships, additional contracts during the war, and those contracts will run until—may be postponed further—but in my judgment will run until 1927. But you can not tell what they will make between now and then. This extension of six months, I believe, was made unanimously by the Naval Affairs Committee. It would give the Government the advantage of six months in which to include from the date of the declaration of war to six months after 1918. That time was for the advantage of the Government, and we think that six months ought to be perhaps the time the Government might have.

Now, so far as the New York Shipbuilding Co. is concerned, that work will be anticipated up to the date; and section 2a of section 2, I believe, will cover such cases, so there may be an estimate made of the amount of profits that might have been made and could have been made up to this date by this company and might at that time be adjusted and settlement made with the company and not wait for a settlement until 1927. It may not be finished before 1930. It is my judgment that some of these ships may never be completed, for I feel as a living man we have voted through here the last large naval appropriation bill. I have confidence in the judgment of the nations, and I believe an agreement will be reached that will relieve us of the large burden we now have upon us in the way of preparing a naval armament. But the other question is this: These contracts have been made; these great losses have been sustained. Let me give you an illustration. However, I agreed to yield before I stop.

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will.

Mr. WYANT. The question which I had in mind was asked by the gentleman from Michigan. The answer to his question, I find, was incorrect, as I believe, because section 2a provides for an additional class of claims.

Mr. BUTLER. It does.

Mr. WYANT. I would like to hear some explanation of section 2a.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would be delighted, if we reach that section after a while, unless the bill dies by the stroke of the House, to go fully into that with my friend.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER. I must yield to my floor leader. If the time comes when you can ask questions and I can answer them, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Wyoming, and I yield to him the balance of my time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important measure. It deals with a variety of subjects important in the development of the Navy. By reason of the fact that it deals with quite a variety of subjects I am of the opinion that the bill can be best considered under the 5-minute rule. The difficulty about general debate on a bill of this character is that one gentleman asks a question about one paragraph and another gentleman asks questions about or discusses another paragraph, and we all become more or less confused. Under the 5-minute rule, with plenty of time, the attention of the House will be centered upon the paragraph under discussion, and I believe we will make better headway and have more intelligent discussion than we would under an extension of the general debate. My advice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be that at the expiration of his time he ask the committee to rise and close the general debate and begin discussion under the 5-minute rule. I simply make that suggestion for his consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank you very much.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is now making the suggestion that general debate be permitted to those in favor of the bill, but that those who are opposed to it must get along under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not that. The gentleman agrees with me surely that it is very difficult for those who are favorable, as well as those who are not favorable to the different provisions of the bill to carry on an intelligent discussion of a measure dealing with many problems under a general debate in which one gentleman discusses one paragraph and another discusses another and a third asks questions about still another paragraph. But that is simply a suggestion. The matter is under the control of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I should not take the time of the committee at all at this time in a discussion outside of the purview of this bill if it were not for some remarks made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I am sorry he is not here that I might mingle my tears with his over his fears of the decadence of the House. Really I have been under the impression that the House was "doing fairly well, I thank you," in maintaining its proper place and its proper dignity and having its proper share in the settlement of questions of legislation. I am sorry that my friend feels troubled about that matter. His troubles do not, however, relate so much to anything that has occurred as they do to matters that he fears may occur. My advice to him is to remember that it is just as well not to trouble yourself about things that may never happen. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, and we are so very busy that we really have not time to bother ourselves about things that may never occur.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I have a very brief period only. I am sorry I can not.

Mr. GARNER. I did not want the gentleman to deplore my absence from the Chamber. I wanted him to know that I was here for any assaults he might desire to make.

Mr. MONDELL. No assault is, of course, intended. My regret was that the gentleman was not here that I might mingle my lamentations with his.

The gentleman has read in a newspaper somewhere that the House is to be hurried with its consideration, in committee and in the House, of the revenue bill. The gentleman might have read in other papers regrets and caustic criticisms to the effect that the House was taking too much time and would continue to take too much time in the consideration of the revenue bill.

These fine pleasant young gentlemen who make their living by writing for the newspapers write as accurately as they may, and when they are not in possession of all the facts, and frequently because of the fact that there is no one that can prophesy just what will occur, it is necessary for them to make the best guess they can as to the probable march of events.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Now, what is to happen, as I understand it, is this: That the Committee on Ways and Means, a splendid committee both as to its majority and minority members, will carefully consider the questions of revenue, will in due time, after deliberation, report a bill, which bill will be considered in the House in such form and manner as may be determined upon after full consultation by the majority in conference, under its responsibility; after proper consideration in the House the bill will be sent to the Senate, as the best possible product of our judgment. We hope it will be an excellent measure. The Senate may disagree with some of its items, but I do not want my friend from Texas to feel badly about it in advance. He may be very well satisfied in the future. We are quite sure that most everybody else will be at any rate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If I have time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the matter progressed far enough for the gentleman to be able to tell us whether the revenue bill will be brought in under a rule that will cut off amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I just stated a moment ago, if the gentleman was listening, what would be done; that the majority in conference on its responsibility would finally determine what should be done and how it shall be done. And in due course the gentleman from Tennessee will be informed.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is worried because, among other things, he fears that the dignity of the House is to suffer in the matter of a reported dinner at the White House. I rise to assure the gentleman that he need have no fears in that matter. There will, I am informed, be at least as many Members of the House present at the dinner this evening as there were Members of the Senate at the dinner day before yesterday.

All this, I am sure, the gentleman will be delighted to know; and I hasten to afford him this additional evidence—that the dignity and the prestige of the House is being preserved. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am wrong—and I will be indebted to the Chair if he will put me right in case I am wrong—in thinking that in the absence of any agreement in the House as to time of general debate on the bill it is within the jurisdiction of the committee, by unanimous consent, to fix the time for general debate. Is not that right?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has that power, by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will ask the gentlemen of the committee to consent that the general debate may close in 20 minutes, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] may have five minutes each.

Mr. MCCLINTIC. I would like to have five minutes. I am a member of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg my friend's pardon. I did not intend to overlook him.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. We can do it all under the 5-minute rule. But inasmuch as gentlemen, like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], have worked on this bill while members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, they are anxious to say something on this bill in advance of the debate under the 5-minute rule. They can not tell what movement will be made. Therefore I ask that the general debate close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the general debate be limited to 40 minutes from now. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 7464) providing for sundry matters affecting the Naval Establishment, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] whether he would renew his objection now to 40 minutes' general debate? I do not want to move, but—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not want any time at all.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand; but several gentlemen have asked for time. I want to accord it to them. I will state to my friend from Tennessee that the members of the committee will have to take the floor and explain different matters. Forty minutes will cover it, if the gentleman will not object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know. I do object to the Committee of the Whole fixing the time of debate.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood that was the gentleman's objection, and therefore I moved that the committee rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman can make his motion.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the general debate be closed on this bill in 40 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman has not moved to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and, pending that motion, I move that the general debate be limited to 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the general debate be limited to 40 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Will the general debate be based on the idea that unanimous consent will be given to the gentleman to control the time?

Mr. BUTLER. I intend to yield to those gentlemen who have made requests for time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] having consumed his time in favor of the bill—I assume one hour of time—the House now goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is not some Member opposed to the bill entitled to control the time allowed up to an hour?

The SPEAKER. Of course, that would be a matter for the chairman in the committee to determine, but it would seem to the Chair that that would be so if the gentleman had used one hour.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, following the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] whether he desires to have time in opposition to the bill yielded to those in opposition?

Mr. MANN. He is not the only one in opposition in the House. What I am trying to do is to get a fair discussion of this bill from men in the House, so that members of the Committee on Naval Affairs may know something about it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Am I correct in the idea that the motion pending is to limit debate to 40 minutes?

The SPEAKER. That is the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I demand the regular order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; but that takes me off my feet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That brings the House to an immediate vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Nevertheless, I have no time to yield to anyone.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] that general debate shall be limited to 40 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7864.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 15.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The "ayes" have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, was a point of no quorum made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear any.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The "ayes" have it, and the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7864. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] will please resume the Chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7864) providing for sundry matters affecting the Naval Establishment (Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7864, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7864) providing for certain matters affecting the Naval Establishment.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have the greatest respect for and confidence in the members of the legislative Committee on Naval Affairs. I regret being unable to bring myself, however, to the point of agreeing to the provisions of a bill seeking to direct the Secretary of the Navy to consider numerous claims against the Government and to adjudicate them in the manner which this bill provides. The House will be interested to know that it was brought to the attention of the Appropriations Committee at a recent meeting that there are large unexpended balances in the Navy, in the War, and other departments of the Government, and the Committee on Appropriations are now seeking to ascertain what these unexpended balances amount to.

This bill you are now considering would authorize the Secretary of the Navy under very general authority to determine what are valid claims against the Government and to authorize payment of those claims out of any unexpended appropriations.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And his judgment, thus arrived at, would have the effect of a judgment in a court, would it not?

Mr. OLIVER. It would. Now, this is a responsibility of the House, and the House should not shirk it. When this matter was being considered by the Naval Committee, while I was a member of the committee, I recall that the chairman and other members of the committee were in pretty full agreement that we should only authorize the Secretary of the Navy to have hearings on these different claims and to report back his findings to the House, and not to direct that he ascertain and determine what are valid claims and that such claims be paid out of existing appropriations without further reference to Congress. This bill is not drawn so as to accord with that purpose.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Section 1 provides for just the contrary to what the gentleman has said.

Mr. OLIVER. Other sections provide for exactly what I said. It is always unfortunate to have contradictory sections. Let me read to the gentleman from the bill the following:

Such adjustment and determination shall be conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Government, and the amounts thus found shall be paid from any appropriation already available therefor.

Mr. BRITTEN. May I suggest to the gentleman what he probably knows as well as I do, that this section applies only to informal contracts, supplemental agreements signed by the Navy Department and by the contractor himself, which the comptroller has held to be illegal. It does not apply to the great majority of the claims against the Government at all.

Mr. OLIVER. The fact is that the objections I offer apply to all kinds of claims, which this bill seeks to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to determine are valid claims against the Government. If the parties contracting with the Navy Department at the time they made their contracts knew that the Secretary of the Navy had no authority to make the contracts in the form in which they were made, they must rely on a strong equitable claim in demanding pay for work done, and that is a matter which Congress should reserve to itself to hereafter pass on. Why, the gentleman indicated that he was willing that this amendment be accepted, viz:

Provided, That no finding or action of the Secretary of the Navy under the provisions of this act shall constitute a claim against the Government on which suit can be filed in any court or be evidence in any court of an obligation by the Government.

I think that proper. Yet at the same time I think the Government should also be protected against the payment of these claims, so ascertained by the Secretary or his subordinates, out of any existing appropriations.

The Navy Department now has many appropriations that are carried over from year to year out of which many amounts ascertained under this bill could be paid. Surely, until the Appropriations Committee can ascertain what these balances are and for what purposes they are carried, the House will not authorize an indefinite number of obligations to be paid out of those balances. That is why I felt the House would like to have this information, because these appropriations which are carried over belong to the National Treasury. Why not have a statement of what these amounts are before we give blanket authority to the Secretary of the Navy to create obligations payable out of such funds?

Mr. BUTLER. I want my friend to tell us, please, where this money is. No doubt the gentleman is entirely accurate in what he has said, but I had no idea there were unexpended balances out of which these claims could be paid. I did not suppose that until this minute when I have just heard it.

Mr. OLIVER. The committee had that in mind and the Navy Department had it in mind in drawing this bill. Let me read to the gentleman these lines in section 5.

In case there is no appropriation available for such payment the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress his findings and recommendations in relation thereto.

The Navy Department well understood that there were many accumulating appropriations carried over from year to year and out of which these amounts could be paid. There can be no question about that.

Mr. BUTLER. I have understood that some of these claims might be paid out of the appropriations made for the increase of the Navy.

Mr. OLIVER. Unquestionably so.

Mr. BUTLER. Hereafter to be made by the gentleman's committee, but I express my surprise at the statement of the gentleman that there are existing balances out of which they could be paid.

Mr. OLIVER. There are many millions of dollars carried over under different appropriations made in previous years still unexpended.

Mr. BUTLER. Available to be used for this purpose?

Mr. OLIVER. That could be used for this purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not know that.

Mr. OLIVER. The chairman of the committee mentioned just a few minutes ago that some of these claims might be paid out of the appropriation for the increase of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. That is an amount carried over from year to year, and you are providing for the payment of some claims that might properly be considered under the increase of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. Under future appropriations.

Mr. OLIVER. They have unexpended balances to their credit. I think the hearings show that they had upwards of $37,000,000 unexpended out of the increase last year.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question in connection with the same matter?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Under that language in the bill can not these claims be paid out of appropriations hereafter made?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it susceptible of that construction.

Mr. MANN. Here is an appropriation for certain engineering accounts or ship construction in general language, a large sum appropriated. Would not that appropriation be available for the payment of these claims?

Mr. OLIVER. I am inclined to think so. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that I was a member of the legislative committee when some of the hearings were had, and if you will turn to the hearings you will find that officers, appearing before the committee, made the statement that if given authority to adjudicate these claims, as provided in this bill, they had on hand sufficient money now appropriated to care for such claims. You will find that in the hearings before the legislative committee in the last Congress.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I suggest that the appropriation "for the increase of the Navy" might be used in connection with the construction of ships, but could not be used in connection with the claims on a building contract under yards and docks.

Mr. MANN. No; but it could be paid under the appropriation for yards and docks. What I want to get at is this, and it has not been explained yet. Is this a bill which permits the payment of money, or is it a bill for the investigation of claims yet to be audited, to be reported to Congress for future action by the Committee on War Claims or Claims?

Mr. OLIVER. It is of a dual character—for the payment of money and also for the investigation of claims. In some cases it may be necessary to report the claims back to Congress for an appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Here is an important matter. A claim becomes a legal claim against the Government if it is audited. Audited claims are paid as a matter of course by Congress in the general deficiency bill. A claim authorized to be investigated and report made to Congress of the investigation is a claim up in the air and can only be acted upon by a proper report of the Claims Committee of the House. That amounts to nothing in the way of the payment of a claim. I suspect, although I do not know and I ask for information, that the astute gentlemen who prepared this bill are not attempting to go through an idle performance, and that it is intended in some way to get these claims in a class where they are paid either out of funds appropriated for the Navy or as audited claims by Congress.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that is answered in the statement I just made.

Mr. MANN. I can not tell from the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. It reads:

In case there is no appropriation available for such payment, the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress his findings and recommendations in relation thereto.

There will be many claims, practically all of them, paid out of appropriations already made.

Mr. MANN. That does not say out of appropriations now made. Most of the naval appropriations are of large sums for general purposes, and under that language it looks to me as though they could settle any claims almost and pay them out of money hereafter appropriated for general purposes.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the gentleman is correct. I desire to say that I know the chairman and members of the committee hesitated and expressed grave doubt about the propriety of passing this bill at the last session of Congress. There was great pressure from the outside for a bill of this kind. There are meritorious claims, but this bill as now drawn is too broad, and the House should so amend it as to authorize only an investigation by the Secretary, the House reserving to itself the right of supervising his findings and determining whether appropriations should be made hereafter to pay the same.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As I caught the language of the gentleman's amendment, it does not accomplish the purpose that he has in view.

Mr. OLIVER. Only in a partial way.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It would leave the Navy Department free, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, to pay the claims.

Mr. OLIVER. The amendment I read was not intended to cover all of the objections I make to the different sections.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to say that the only claims the Navy Department can settle under section 2 are claims existing under supplemental agreements, supplemental contracts, for a particular thing, where the Navy Department agrees to pay a certain amount of money for certain work to be executed by the contractor. The contractor has executed the work, and the Navy Department desires to pay him under the contract. It has the money with which to do so, and in most instances it is for a specific purpose. There is no dispute between the Navy Department and the contractor; and while it is called a claim, there is no disputed amount of money, because it has been agreed upon and the Navy Department desires to pay the amount. In many instances the department issued the voucher under the contract with the Navy Department which they thought was valid and legal. There was no way to know that the contract was illegal until the comptroller ruled upon it.

Mr. OLIVER. I can not yield further just now.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is the only character of claim that the department can settle. The other claims can not be settled by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. OLIVER. The trouble about the gentleman's statement is this: The bill as drawn is susceptible of a construction that would lead us far astray from the purposes he has announced.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, in whose judgment I have a great deal of confidence and with whose views I am usually in entire accord, and am here, what he would suggest in the premises? He knows from his examination and I know from mine that there are many claims here that should be paid. Is not that true?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. There are some claims that ought not to be paid, as my friend knows, and we have endeavored to shut them out.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. What would he suggest? How can we proceed? What can we do in order to bring to the attention of Congress these claims of merit which should be paid?

Mr. OLIVER. I would suggest that we do exactly what I understood the chairman at the last session advised. I think I quote him correctly when I say that he advised that we simply direct an investigation of these claims by the Secretary of the Navy and a report by him to Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not the first section about cover that?

Mr. OLIVER. The trouble is that the first and the second sections go further and authorize the payment of these claims out of existing appropriations. It was not the purpose of the committee, when I was a member, to go that far. I hope the gentleman will amend the bill so as to conform to the original purpose of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not the gentleman think that section 1 about covers his views? I do not think there is authority in that to pay. That is given in section 2.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. Section 1 only gives authority to investigate.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not that about cover the gentleman's views?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; but section 2a would also have to be changed.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, referring to section 1, on page 3, lines 7, 8, and 9, will that not set aside any compromise where a voucher has been issued?

Mr. OLIVER. I think so.

Mr. EVANS. Then that should certainly not be so broad as that.

Mr. OLIVER. No; I think that is a mistake.

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McClintic].

Mr. McClintic. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was considered by the Naval Affairs Committee I voted against it for the reason that it contains two very objectionable clauses. If any Member will turn to section 1 and read the proviso found at the end of line 19 I think he would say that if he has a contract with the Navy and it is adjudicated under the terms of this bill he would be able to collect a profit up to 6 per cent, because the language says that the amount of compensation to be paid by the Government to any such contractor for his losses shall not increase his net profit on the entire volume of such business above 6 per cent. If the English language means anything to me it certainly means that any contractor who has a claim against the Navy can collect up to 6 per cent, because the language says that.

Mr. CHALMERS. Even covering a contract where he took it too low.

Mr. McClintic. I do not care what kind of a contract it is; if he has made below 6 per cent, he can file a claim with the Navy Department. In the committee I offered an amendment to strike that language out, and I am going to reoffer the amendment in the Committee of the Whole. The distinguished gentleman who is the leader of the minority said a few moments ago on the floor that the object of this bill was not to pay any contractor a profit.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman think that the language at the bottom of page 1, referring to the losses, which says—

Which actual losses have been brought about by the action of Government agencies—covers the matter, so that if he loses money on his contract the Government will not reimburse him, unless the Government itself is responsible for the loss.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If the gentleman is of that opinion, then why should we object to striking out this particular section, so that it would say that it shall not include any profit? It would not affect the status of a single claimant. I am in favor of giving these contractors proper consideration. I am in favor of allowing them such consideration as would not cause them to lose any money, but I am not in favor of allowing a bill to go through this House which anyone who reads the section will conclude gives a contractor the right to claim up to 6 per cent.

Then if gentlemen will turn to page 3, line 7, they will find another clause to which attention was called a few moments ago by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], which he thought was entirely too broad. I also offered an amendment in the committee to strike out that language, because it would allow any claimant who has had a settlement with the Navy to again come in and ask for a new deal. I hope the House will eliminate those two particular clauses, because they will open the gate in such a way as to allow thousands of contractors who have already made a settlement to come into the Navy Department and say that the settlement is not satisfactory; that the Congress has passed a new bill, which allows them to disregard the settlement made in the past; and that now they present certain claims on the basis of this bill in order that they may obtain some more money out of the Treasury. I think contractors who have had business with the Navy ought to be very glad indeed to make a settlement upon the basis of not making any profits; but I fear that unless you strike out the language on page 2 every contractor who has not made as much as 6 per cent will come in and by the terms of this act collect that amount of money. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that neither naval officers nor Army officers are qualified to pass upon claims involving money against the Government. They make a mighty poor mess of it when they go to sit as adjudicating courts. From the time they first have connection with the Government, when they leave their homes and enter West Point or Annapolis, money begins to come easy to them. Their initial expenses from their homes to Annapolis is paid to them, and they are allowed so much a year, in addition to their education, even while going to school, and after they get out and get their commissions their salaries seem to come easy. They are allowed to buy their goods and their merchandise at cost, while other people pay 100 cents on the dollar for what they buy. Everything to them comes easy, and they are not very careful about finances. I do not think that any officer or any subofficer in the Navy Department ought to pass upon millions of dollars of such claims, and the committee to-day can not tell us just how many millions of dollars these claims involve. Now, let us see. We had up just such a question on May 26, 1920, when there was a bill brought in here from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, seeking to authorize the Shipping Board to settle certain claims with wooden-ship contractors involving about $50,000,000, and that bill was argued extensively here on this floor by various Members, and if I am not mistaken there was almost a unanimous report from the committee favoring that bill, and yet when it was examined closely it was defeated. There was a motion to recommit it to the committee, and upon a division there were, ayes 164 and noes 50, and that bill went back to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to die, and it has slept the sleep of death there ever since May 26, 1920. The committee has never brought it back here and it is as dead as Hector. What happened here the other day? I call attention to the fact that on July 25, 1921, just the other day, there was a bill brought here by the Committee on Military Affairs, with almost a uni-mous report of the committee favoring it, to permit the department to settle radio claims, and it sought to appropriate $2,500,000 as an initial appropriation. That bill involved claims amounting to thirty or forty million dollars as admitted by various officers of this Government, and when my friend from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONZ] moved to strike out the enacting clause on that bill, on a division there were 87 ayes and noes 11, and so the enacting clause of that bill was stricken out because of the good judgment of this House, which said that the settlement of such claims ought not to be left to these boards and these officers down in these departments. They ought to go to the Court of Claims. They ought to be passed upon by the judicial officers of this Government. There ought to be the Government district attorney there to see that the Government gets a fair deal. There ought to be a Federal judge to render a proper judgment. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] that every one of these claims he has mentioned here this afternoon could go to the Court of Claims without any authorization from the Congress. Why, take the matter of the Government taking a contractor's cement. Is not that a matter upon which the law gives the right to the contractor to go into the Court of Claims? Of course it is.

Take the matter of the War Department directing a contractor to build a fence around certain Government work. That is a matter where the contractor who spent the money under the direction of the Government could go to the Court of Claims and have it adjudicated.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have but a few moments, but I will yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no question about getting pay for cement, but there are the liquidated damages of the delay.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that would be considered in the Court of Claims, and he would be given a just deal, and that is where he ought to go.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the specific language carried in this bill. I, however, am more or less familiar with the purpose of the legislation. During the war a great many contracts were interfered with by the Government itself, to the great detriment of the contractor. I have in mind one case where a fixed-price contract was awarded for the construction of a dry dock. The Government subsequently commandeered the cement in that whole region so that the contractor could not supply the cement for the construction of the dock at the price at which he expected to be able to obtain it when the contract was entered into. Then Government boards fixed the wages in the Government yards and plants and even in private yards throughout that whole region, and the contractor was forced to go out and hire men competing with the Government yards and Government plants where wages had been fixed by the Government in excess of what the contractor had expected to pay when he made his contract. So it is a matter of common knowledge on the part of every Member of the House that with the contract made under those circumstances the contractor might be forced into bankruptcy, which was the case in a few instances. Now, my understanding is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to provide relief only in those cases where the Government by its own act interfered with the proper and lawful execution of a contract. I hope that if this language does not properly safeguard the Government the Committee of the Whole will modify the language, but I should very much regret to see the entire paragraph stricken out, because some of those contractors are poor men, and their funds have been tied up and their bank accounts tied up and great injustice has been done in some cases. Of course, the language should not be so wide open as to permit the expenditure of unexpended balances for the payment of these claims.

Payment should be provided for by appropriations made in the proper way, and I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] would be glad to accept any amendment that would do that.

Mr. OLIVER. I share fully in the opinion that that was the primary purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I think perhaps some amendments will be acceptable to him.

Mr. McPHERSON. Take the case of the Idaho, which was referred to, if the Secretary of the Navy thought there was due the builder, the New York Shipbuilding Co., a certain sum of money, how could we ascertain, having no accounting force, whether the statement was right or not?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am not sure that I grasped the gentleman's question. But there is a provision in the paragraph that makes it a condition precedent to filing the claim that the contractor shall file an affidavit to the effect that he did not make as much as 6 per cent on his entire business with the Government between certain dates. The only effect of the 6 per cent provision is to give the Secretary of the Navy jurisdiction of any claim, and if the contractors can not file such a statement his claim can not be considered.

Mr. McPHERSON. Certain gentlemen seem to think that it is an objection to this bill that you will not find out that any of these claims should be paid without coming back to Congress, and the amendment that is promised to be offered is that the Secretary, when he ascertains the amount, will report it to us. My idea is whether there would be any value in doing that? If the Secretary reported certain sums due on one of these contracts, like the one I have instanced, Congress has no means of knowing, have they, whether or not the Secretary has made a mistake?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I suppose the proper committee making the appropriation could make the determination.

Mr. McPHERSON. That would require at least an auditing of the account.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Whether they would act more wise than the Secretary of the Navy I do not know. But the authority to pass on all demands for money would and should, of course, lie with Congress in the last analysis.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one minute.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of course, I can not discuss this bill in one minute. But I wish to say that I think this bill ought to be defeated, and it ought to be defeated for the same reason that the House overwhelmingly defeated the bill just the other day to provide for payments to claimants for radio patents, and for the same reason that during the last Congress we overwhelmingly defeated a bill providing relief for wooden-ship contractors. It is on a par with them. I believe, as I think the House believes, because of its action on those matters, that such claims ought to be determined by a judicial tribunal. If these claimants have legal rights, they can assert them and recover in the Court of Claims. If they have no legal rights, we ought not to pay them. This Government ought to be just to the taxpayer before it is charitable to the contractor [applause], and that is especially so at this time, when the people are righteously demanding and are entitled to economy. Instead of economizing, we are here proposing to pay large sums of money to men who are not legally entitled to them, and in a bill about which one member of the committee just said there were grave misgivings on the part of the committee itself as to whether it should be reported out. I think it is time to stop this digging into the Public Treasury in order to pay Tom, Dick, and Harry. If you are going to try to compensate everybody who incurred losses by reason of the war, even if right, it can not be done, and I say it is not right unless there is a legal liability on the part of the Government. Look at the hundreds of thousands of farmers who, under pressure and encouragement of the Government, planted certain crops, which they raised at a loss, and some of which they could not sell at all. Is there any legislation to reimburse them? There are large numbers of manufacturers who went into the manufacture of various supplies for governmental uses under the encouragement of Government officials, and when the war was terminated unexpectedly they were left with goods on hand which they were unable to sell, or, if sold, were compelled to sell at a loss. Machinery and factories which they provided for this business were left on their hands and are without value. Numberless other citizens incurred losses of various kinds. We have just as much right to reimburse those as we have to reimburse these contractors. We have not even enacted the adjusted compensation bill for the soldiers who did our fighting. And yet we are asked to pay millions to these contractors, who are disappointed because they did not make enormous profits out of their contracts with the Government, as they had expected, although they are not entitled to such payments either by contract or law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized and directed to receive and investigate claims, submitted under oath and filed with the Navy Department within 60 days from the passage of this act, looking to reimbursement of contractors, through appropriations to be made by Congress for that purpose, upon estimates furnished by the Secretary from time to time, for actual losses under fixed-price contracts occur- ring after April 6, 1917, but not including losses of anticipated profits, which actual losses have been brought about by the action of Government agencies, sovereign or otherwise, and not by the fault or negligence of the contractor, after the date upon which such contracts were entered into and which have arisen under contracts made between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, or under contracts which were entered into before and were due for completion after April 6, 1917, either by the terms of the contracts or authorized extensions thereof, but no such claim shall be received or investigated unless the claimant shall file with the Secretary of the Navy an affidavit in writing that he did not make a net profit of 6 per cent on the entire volume of his business with or for the United States Government upon contracts entered into during the period between April 6, 1917, and June 30, 1919, or that were entered into before and were due for completion after April 6, 1917, either by the terms of the contracts or authorized extensions thereof: Provided, That "net profits" hereunder shall be ascertained as provided in section 302 of the revenue act approved September 8, 1916: Provided further, That the amount of compensation to be paid by the Government to any such contractor for his losses shall not increase his net profit on the entire volume of such business above 6 per cent.

The Secretary shall reject claims for losses arising from loss or cancellation of commercial business resulting from mandatory orders placed by the Navy Department or from fixed-price contracts made by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy voluntarily entered into with the Navy Department; and claims based upon any contract or order modified or canceled in whole or in part, the terms of which modification or cancellation shall have been agreed upon by the parties to the contract since November 11, 1918; but execution of a final voucher or release under the provisions of a contract shall not bar the claimant from relief under this act if he is otherwise entitled thereto. In case the performance of the contract by any contractor as contemplated herein is not completed prior to the passage of this act, the claimant may file a preliminary claim within 60 days after the passage hereof and may thereafter, within 30 days after the completion of work under such contract, file final claim.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McCLINTIC: Page 2, line 10, after the word "make," strike out the words "a net profit of 6 per cent" and add the words "any profit."

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will make it read, if he did not make any profit on the entire volume of his business, and so forth. If you will turn to page 1, line 10, you will see that this bill provides for "actual" losses. I can not see any reason why we should leave the bill in such a way that it would be subject to be construed that a person who had not made up the 6 per cent would have a right to file a claim with the Government. If this House wants this bill only to refer to actual losses, then I think the amendment ought to be adopted. So I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, it has been a common understanding among men that 6 per cent is a proper interest on their investment, and I would not belong to any combination of men that would charge more than that. It was suggested a larger sum should be written in here. The Secretary of the Navy, to my recollection, finally suggested it should be 6 per cent. Now, I think it is only fair that upon the volume of business that a man has he may be entitled to make 6 per cent. That is the interest that I pay upon my mortgage, I believe, and I think the mortgagee is entitled to his interest and the manufacturer is entitled to profit up to 6 per cent. I take it that it is only fair among men.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If I understand the gentleman correctly, it is right to allow 6 per cent?

Mr. BUTLER. Six per cent profit. I understand it will be 6 per cent that they made. Now, how shall that be computed? It is provided in this bill that it shall be ascertained in a certain way; that it shall be ascertained according to the provisions of the act of Congress authorizing the collection of certain taxes, reference being made to a provision of Congress later on. You can do no better than that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. This section is for the purpose of having an investigation of the claims made?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. An investigation of somebody's claims made?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Now we want to know what the claims are.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What difference does it make whether he lost 6 per cent on one contract and made 12 per cent on another? What we want to find out is what he is claiming.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, it is a condition precedent under the provisions of this act that unless he can write it down in his affidavit that he has not made on the whole volume of his business 6 per cent the Secretary of the Navy has no power to investigate it.

Mr. WALSH. Then if on his own admission a man has made 6 per cent on the rest of his business, no matter how harsh the Government was in interfering with the operations under this particular contract, of stopping materials and taking materials away from him, or raising wages, or doing any of these other things about which they complain, if on all the rest of the Government's business with him he made 6 per cent the Government was justified in treating him that way and he has no loss upon which to present a claim against the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to explain my view of it, not in response to what the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated, but following up the statement the gentleman made. If on all the business the contractor had, of all kinds, with the Government during a certain period, all added up, he has made as much as 6 per cent profit, he can not even for actual damages make a claim against the Government.

Mr. WALSH. What about his claim in the Court of Claims, if he has any?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. He is unable to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. WALSH. Some of these claims, it was explained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITEN], involved contractual obligations and breach of contract.

Mr. BUTLER. I would say where he has a legal right to press his claim in the Court of Claims he will not be considered here. It was my understanding that in this bill we cover nothing but equitable rights, and wherever a written contract was made with the Government and the contractor has the right under the law, he will go in the Court of Claims and settle it. We are authorizing the department to investigate claims where the rights are equitable only.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPEAKS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] will excuse me for a moment.

Mr. SPEAKS. Very well.

Mr. McKENZIE. Suppose a contractor made $300,000 on one contract with the Government, and that he lost $300,000 on another contract with the Government. He would then have just broken even and would have suffered no loss. Is that true?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it intended under the provisions of this bill to permit that gentleman to come in before this board and ask that he be granted 6 per cent? Is that the idea?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If that is true, let me ask the gentleman, further, is it to compensate him for the loss or is it to compensate him or his claim agent for his nerve?

Mr. BUTLER. No; I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not care what you do with this bill. I am not treating it as a joke. I believe that the Government ought to deal honestly and squarely with its own citizens. I want to say to my friend that, as I understand it, on the whole volume of business that may be done if it is shown or the contractor admits that he has had a profit of 6 per cent, he has no claim whatever of any kind against the Government.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not going to stand on my feet much longer. It matters not to me what you do.

Mr. SPEAKS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I am a member of the Committee on Claims. As a subcommittee two claims have been referred to me for investigation, both identical, as I recall. Down in Arkansas in 1916 a man took a contract to carry the mails, based, of course, upon normal conditions. In 1917 this Congress declares war, all beyond the possibility of the gentleman from Arkansas to foresee. A military camp is established in his immediate community, with the result that the volume of mail is increased fourfold, and the poor fellow loses $15,000. Is it not almost a parallel case, and would it not be fair to offer an amendment authorizing the Postmaster General to take up this and similar claims and adjust them in the same manner?

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to the gentleman that the Post Office Department has authority under law already made to adjust that. The Post Office Department and the Treasury Department, on all public-building work, and the War Department, on river and harbor work, all have the authority that is asked here, although it is more confined.

Mr. SPEAKS. The War Department disclaims any such right.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Government, without any fault of this contractor, caused him to suffer loss, the Government ought to make him whole.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] to yield to me for an honest question. I want to get some information.

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield to my friend and I will try to give him an honest answer.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] referred to the case of a man who had two contracts, on one of which he made $300,000 and on the other of which he lost $300,000. I want to ask the gentleman, if a man had one contract with the Government and he lost $300,000 on it, could he come in under this bill and be reimbursed?

Mr. BUTLER. I am going to answer that the best I know how.

Mr. PADGETT. Will my friend yield to me to allow me to answer that question?

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman [Mr. CHALMERS] will permit, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] to answer the question, because he has given this measure a great deal of attention.

Mr. PADGETT. Take the specific case of a contractor who had two contracts.

Mr. CHALMERS. No; I am asking about a man who had one contract.

Mr. PADGETT. If a man had two contracts and on one he lost $300,000 and on the other he gained $300,000, he could come to the Secretary of the Navy and have the question of his loss on the one contract determined; not to get 6 per cent or any profit whatever, but simply to make good his loss on the one contract on which he lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means the section after the enacting clause?

Mr. WALSH. The section after the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the section. The Chair is in doubt whether that is in order until the amendment to perfect the text has been acted upon.

Mr. WALSH. The perfecting amendment should be voted on first, but that does not affect my right to offer the motion now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the section. All those in favor of the motion will say aye. [The affirmative vote was taken.] All those opposed will say no. [The negative vote was taken.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the amendment to perfect the section to be voted upon first?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moved to strike out the section.

Mr. MANN. He had a right to offer his motion, but not to have it voted upon before the perfecting amendment was voted upon.

Mr. MONDELL. The Chair has submitted the motion and the committee is voting upon it. No point of order was made against it.

Mr. MANN. No point of order could be made against the motion, but the rule is that an amendment to perfect the section is voted upon before the motion to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct, and that the vote must first be had upon the motion to perfect the text, even though the Chair erroneously put the other motion first.

Mr. WALSH. I did not want the Chair to understand that I was contending that my motion should be voted upon first. I was only contending that I had the right to offer it now, notwithstanding the motion to perfect the text should be voted upon first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, first, on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma to perfect the text.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to discuss my motion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. May I be heard in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts or of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC]? I should like to be heard in opposition to that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been debate on that motion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not believe there has been anybody heard in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask some member of the committee what the language at the top of page 2 means—

By the action of Government agencies sovereign or otherwise?

Mr. BUTLER. That is the language used by the comptroller in passing upon some of these claims.

Mr. WALSH. But what does the language mean?

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I can answer that question. The Railroad Administration have exercised governmental authority, and the priorities board—

Mr. BUTLER. Both those bodies.

Mr. McPHERSON. All these bodies acting within the scope of their authority have done certain things, and this refers to the action of such governmental agencies, for which the comptroller has held that no one can claim damages.

Mr. MANN. It is easy enough to give illustrations of what it is, but where do you draw the line? What is it?

Mr. McPHERSON. We do not draw any line, because no action—

Mr. MANN. The sky is the limit.

Mr. McPHERSON. The idea of the committee was to cover cases where anyone had suffered loss on account of any wrongful action of a governmental agency, because the courts have all held that no one may bring an action against the United States for a tort or wrongful action of a governmental agency.

Mr. WALSH. This does not necessarily involve wrongful action.

Mr. McPHERSON. It certainly does. For instance, it involves cases like the taking of the man's cement, when the contractor had done as he agreed to do, and had his cement on the dock at the place where he was about to use it, and the priorities board took his cement away from him and sent it to France.

Mr. WALSH. Who says that was wrong?

Mr. McPHERSON. I say it was wrong.

Mr. WALSH. The contractor says so.

Mr. McPHERSON. I say so. A man had a contract to build a dock and required a shipload of cement. He procured the cement and was ready to do the work. The priority board took the cement and gave it to some one else, commandeered it, and took it away and sent it to Europe. If it had been a private citizen, it would have been a conversion or a trespass, but the Government is not liable for a conversion or a tort or a trespass.

Mr. WALSH. If the Government is not liable for a conversion, how can it be wrongful?

Mr. McPHERSON. The Government may not be legally liable and yet commit a wrongful act.

Mr. WALSH. It can be wrongful if it does something that the contractor does not like. From a legal point of view the Government is not liable for a conversion.

Mr. McPHERSON. No; but it is wrongful for the Government. It is a trespass, and it is wrong. The Government is not liable because it is a sovereign power, but it is wrong just the same.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says that a sovereign can do no wrong, but if it is something the contractor does not like it is wrong.

Mr. McPHERSON. I take the position that it is wrong, but the Government is not required to respond in damages.

Mr. WALSH. Is it wrong to increase wages?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is a wrong to the contractor.

Mr. WALSH. But from the Government standpoint it is not wrong.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Government in its sovereign capacity creates a loss through railroad administration in failing to furnish cars, or takes the material that the contractor had and gives it to some one else whereby the contractor suffers a loss on that account, I think he ought to be paid.

Mr. WALSH. Sure; that is it. Now, what do you mean by the words "or otherwise" on the top of page 2? That is my difficulty. I am not cognizant of what some of these terms mean.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. What do the words "or otherwise" mean?

Mr. McPHERSON. We mean that if the Government of the United States, through any of these agencies—Railroad Administration, the Shipping Board, or any other agency—has occasioned these contractors a loss, we want to pay them for it.

Mr. WALSH. But what do the words "or otherwise" mean?

Mr. McPHERSON. That includes other ways and methods and other agencies.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. CHALMERS. In the gentleman's judgment, if the contractor has one contract and loses $300,000, under this bill he could be reimbursed?

Mr. WALSH. I understand from the explanations made by the gentleman from Tennessee that he could.

Mr. CHALMERS. In that case he would be reimbursed for losses even for mismanagement.

Mr. WALSH. Absolutely.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SWING. It is not mismanagement, because the only loss to be reimbursed for here is a loss caused by the act of the intervention of the Government. It is not a loss caused by mismanagement.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I should like to ask the gentleman if the Government was not exercising sovereign power when it took a young man drawing $100 a month in a bank and put him into the Army at $30 a month?

Mr. WALSH. Absolutely. I think I endeavored in a feeble way to point that out when we had the other measure in here for the adjustment of claims infringing radio patents. This is along the same line, on a little different plan, but the principle is practically the same.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rather think the dog days are here and that the House is in such a humor that perhaps the best thing is to adjourn and sleep over it. Let me say in reference to the bill, however, that its purpose is right and just. It simply provides that where the Government made a contract with one of its citizens and through its own action caused that citizen a loss in executing the contract, it shall compensate him for the loss caused by the action of the Government. That is right. That feature of the bill ought to appeal to every just man.

Now, the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma is wrong, because he misconceives the paragraph he is seeking to strike out. This bill, in fact, does not fully give what is just between man and man, and says that notwithstanding the contractor may have lost something by the act of the Government in connection with one contract, if on other contracts he has made enough to make him an aggregate of 6 per cent, he can not be paid anything whatever for the loss caused to him by the action of the Government.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. How does the gentleman get around this language:

In case there is no appropriation available for such payment the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress his findings and recommendations in relation thereto.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman will have patience and let me complete my remarks, I will try and answer him. Take the case spoken of by a Member a moment ago. Two ships at equal price are authorized to be built, and one ship the contractor proceeds on without interruption, without any loss caused by the Government, and makes 20 per cent profit. On the other ship he is obstructed by the Government, he is commanded to do this, that, and the other thing; his help is taken away from him, his supplies are taken away from him, and he makes a loss of 4 per cent on that. The two together would show a net profit of 8 per cent. In that case he could not get a cent for the losses caused by the action of the Government, because if he got anything he would make over 6 per cent in the aggregate. The paragraph the gentleman wants to strike out is a limitation. If you strike that out, the rest of the bill would authorize the contractor to recover 4 per cent which he had lost by the action of the Government in one contract, even though he had made unconscionable and profiteering profits on other work for the Government. The paragraph in question wipes out his loss in one case by his excess profits in another. It is more than just to the Government, because if two men made two contracts, each contract would be a law unto itself, and no just claim for loss in one could be offset by profits made in the other.

Mr. DOWELL. Suppose he had lost on the other contract, then what?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If there was a loss on both contracts, one a loss without the intervention of the Government?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then you permit him to collect whatever loss to him had been occasioned by the action of the Government, and that would be right.

Mr. DOWELL. You permit him to collect everything that he has lost through the action of the Government, and if he lost on the other ship he would be permitted to collect the balance under this bill.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. He would be permitted to collect all that he lost by the action of the Government.

Mr. DOWELL. That is what this bill permits under any other contract that he had with the Government.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes; certainly. As I say, the House seems to be suffering from a lack of deliberate study or a befuddled mental condition.

Mr. DOWELL. That is a proviso in this bill.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The language of the proviso is that if he sustains a loss through the action of the Government he may recover all of that loss unless in other transactions he has made enough profit to swallow up his loss and still leave him 6 per cent profit on the whole.

Mr. DOWELL. But if he lost in the other transactions, then he is permitted to supply that under this proviso.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Not at all. He is not permitted to recover anything but the loss caused by the Government in a given transaction, and not permitted to recover that if in other transactions he has made a profit sufficient to make 6 per cent on the sum total of his contracts.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman state briefly why this is a better way than to submit each individual claim to a committee, I do not care whether it be the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Claims?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The Secretary of the Navy is the man provided by this bill to provide the agencies, the lawyers or the courts, or whatever it is to determine these matters, and would you not rather put it in his charge than in that of a committee of this House, who might or might not be well advised?

Mr. BEGG. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I intended to offer an amendment, and shall offer it if the paragraph does not go out, to strike out the part of lines 5, 6, and 7 which gives authority to recover losses on contracts that were made before the war on which there might not have been a completion until after the war had started. Surely you should not allow losses for contracts that occurred prior to the war.

But I want to call the attention of my colleague from Texas [Mr. HARDY] to the particular provision that he was talking about—

Provided further, That the amount of compensation to be paid by the Government to any such contractor for his losses shall not increase his net profit on the entire volume of such business above 6 per cent.

That 6 per cent refers to the increases and not to the total profit. It is as if the language read "shall not increase his net profit on his total business more than 6 per cent." If any man will read that carefully he will see that that is true. If a man had made 24 per cent, and this did not increase his total profit above 6 per cent, he could still get the loss, no matter if he had made 24 per cent profit on his total business, and I defy any man to read that and come to any other conclusion. My colleague says that it was not read carefully by the House. I submit that it has been. This provision does not say "increased to a point where the profits shall not exceed 6 per cent." If it said that it shall not increase his net profits to a point where his total profits would be above 6 per cent, it would accomplish the purpose intended, but this says that it shall not increase his net profits above 6 per cent; that is what the language says, and any man who will read it carefully will come to that conclusion. In other words, as it now reads, the claimant could recover any loss, provided the amount was not so large as to increase the net profits on his total business more than 6 per cent.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman think this paragraph is not a restriction or a limitation?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I most assuredly do not think that it is a restriction. I think it was intended as a restriction, but when you come to construe language you construe not what was meant by the person in his mind but what is meant by the language itself. The intent as shown by the language governs.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Could the gentleman draw an amendment that would make it a limitation?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think I could, but I think the better way is to strike out the paragraph. But it can be drawn to accomplish the purpose intended, of course. You can class it as a limitation, but it is not a limitation as it is drawn here.

Another reason why this paragraph should go out is the provision that reads as follows:

But execution of a final voucher or release under the provisions of a contract shall not bar the claimant from relief under this act if he is otherwise entitled thereto.

By putting that language in there you open the floodgates so that every man who has settled his contract in respect to anything connected with the Navy, no matter how fair the settlement may be, can take it up again and present his claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is this debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair assumes it was on the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts open for discussion at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is open for discussion.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, during the last hour I have tried my hand at trying to fix this bill by an amendment so that the bill might read as I thought this committee intended it to be in the first place. I believe it was the intention of the committee, from what the gentleman from Alabama stated, to put machinery in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy by which he might investigate these claims and by which he might recommend them to the Congress and Congress might allow them. But you have done more than that, gentlemen. You have got here another Dent Act that will be worse than that act. The Dent Act and the claims which were allowed under it constituted our worst experience of the war. The trouble about the matter was that the machinery was not executed by the Secretary of War and it will not be executed here by Secretary Denby. It will be executed by a lot of subordinates who are in his office. They can allow claims according to what they believe to be the justice of the matter, and I am convinced, as a lawyer, after reading this bill time and time again, if these claims are allowed by these agencies of the Navy Department, such allowances will constitute valid judgments which will be binding upon this Congress. Gentlemen, as a result of the Claims Board work during this war under the Dent Act up to this time the financial officers of the War Department have recovered back over $24,000,000 which was wrongfully paid under that act, and just because somebody, not knowing what to do or how to do it, allowed claims and allowed the contractors to rush in and get everything they claimed—

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. BEGG. The Claims Board allowed claims of over $3,000,000,000. No wonder they recovered $24,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is true. There is not any limitation on these things. Do not let us do this thing. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania take it to his committee and rereport it the way it ought to be. [Applause.] When you report it back that way I will vote for it.

Mr. BUTLER. What I am after is to have it perfected; to have it right. Now, will the gentleman lay down just exactly what his view is?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will tell the gentleman what my view is. I would say to Secretary Denby, "We will give you money. You organize your machinery, investigate these things, sift out the claims which are just, and then after you have sifted them out bring them in and we will bring in individual bills and we will pay them." [Applause.] I would not give him the right to pay anything he desires. That will not do. We had our experience in this war. I walked up and down this rostrum and tore my hair about this very kind of thing during the last Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I sat here and the gentleman did tear his hair, and when we tried to learn what became of the money expended on aircraft we never were told—

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. God knows, I do not know. We are trying to find out now. So let us not do the same thing.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman's suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is exactly what the bill provides in every instance where there is a claim against the Government, excepting under section 2, whenever the claim is based on a specific supplemental agreement with the contractor—a written agreement.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let us look at that for a moment—

Mr. BRITTEN. In every instance.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman has said that several times. However, the bill gives ample and full authority to settle all kinds of claims, legal and illegal, and to bind the Congress by such settlements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendments and all amendments to the paragraph be now closed, except the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that debate upon the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. May we have that again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 73, noes 28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Does the amendment strike out the section or the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The section.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, Mr. Chairman, we come to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The word "contractors" shall be deemed to include subcontractors and material men who may present their claims either directly to the Secretary of the Navy or through their respective contractors. The Secretary of the Navy, for the purposes of this investigation, shall have the right to summon witnesses and examine them under oath, acting either in person or through such agencies as he may establish, and may require the claimant to exhibit his books and papers, and may, within his discretion, submit affidavits of the claimant to the Secretary of the Treasury to be compared with income-tax or other returns from the affiant on file in the Treasury Department, and whenever it shall be found by the Secretary of the Treasury that there is a discrepancy he shall notify the Secretary of the Navy that the affidavit appears to be insufficient, and whenever the discrepancy appears to be of such nature as to warrant such action shall make the necessary reference to the Department of Justice.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. BUTLER. Inasmuch as the committee struck out section 1, which is only a part of the machinery, I move that section 2 be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER: Page 3, line 16, strike out the remainder of page 3, and, on page 4, down to and including line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MANN. Do not make that motion yet.

Mr. HERRICK. Let us get rid of it. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the rest of the bill relates to the personnel of the Navy, the right to rectify discharges and injuries that were done to the enlisted personnel of the Navy that served during the war, and if the enacting clause is stricken out there is a provision of the rules that the same subject can not be considered again at the same session of Congress. And it would be a very great injustice to the enlisted personnel of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a vote.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I would like to ask if section 10 does not provide for increase of authorized limits of cost on certain battleships?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HERRICK. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 1, noes 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STEAGALL. I move to recommit the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is out of order at this time. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2a. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust and determine the amount equitably and justly due to any contractor under a formal contract executed by the Secretary or under his authority, which amount is in addition to or an element of the consideration named in such contract, where such amount has been expended by the contractor in accordance with any written agreement, whether in statutory form or not, or on the faith of any written promise of reimbursement, authorization, or order, when said agreement, authorization, promise, or order was made by the Secretary of the Navy or under his authority in connection with the performance of such formal contract and was made because of the exigencies arising out of the war; and such adjustment and determination shall be conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Government, and the amount thus found shall be paid from any appropriation available therefor. In case there is no appropriation available for such payment the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress his findings and recommendations in relation thereto.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, owing to the action of the committee as to the first section, this ought to go out. I therefore offer an amendment to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER: Page 4, line 9, strike out all of the remainder on page 4, and on page 5 strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that sections 2b and 2c be not read, but stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that section 2b and section 2c be stricken from the bill without reading. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the sections which were stricken from the bill:

SEC. 2b. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, as an incident to the relief contemplated by this act, to waive, mitigate, or remit liquidated damages for delays in completion of contracts, deducted under the provisions of contracts falling within the scope of this act, in those cases and to the extent that such delay is ascertained to be due to the causes specified in section 1 of this act, and he is authorized to prescribe regulations for the purpose of carrying this provision into effect.

SEC. 2c. That an appropriation is hereby authorized, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, of a sum not exceeding $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of the expenses of the investigations authorized by the foregoing provisions of this act, including such additional clerical and technical assistants as the Secretary of the Navy may see proper to employ.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That all men transferred from the Regular Navy to the Fleet Naval Reserve who have heretofore reenlisted or may hereafter reenlist in the Navy shall, from the date of reenlistment, be credited with pay at the same rate, exclusive of retainer pay, that they were receiving when on active duty in the Navy as members of the Fleet Naval Reserve prior to date of reenlistment in the Navy, and shall be required to serve under their reenlistment only such time as added to the time served in the enlistment in which serving when transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve and the time of active service in the Navy while members of the Fleet Naval Reserve shall equal four years, when they shall be entitled to be discharged by reason of expiration of enlistment.

That any enlisted man of the Navy or Marine Corps who has been discharged to enable him to be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force or Marine Corps Reserve as a commissioned or warrant officer, and who has heretofore reenlisted in the Navy or who may hereafter reenlist in the Navy within four months from the date of termination of his service as an officer in the Naval Reserve Force or Marine Corps Reserve, shall be restored to the grade, rank, or rating held by him at time of discharge from the Navy to permit enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force or Marine Corps Reserve, and he shall be entitled from the date he has heretofore so reenlisted, or may hereafter reenlist, to the same rate of pay, including subsequent increases therein, as he was receiving at time of discharge from the Navy to permit enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force, and shall be required to serve under such reenlistment only for such time as, added to the unexpired portion of the enlistment from which discharged and his active service in the Naval Reserve Force, shall equal four years, when he shall be entitled to be discharged by reason of expiration of enlistment.

That any member of the Fleet Naval Reserve, transferred thereto after 16 or 20 years' service in the Navy, who has heretofore been discharged therefrom to accept temporary appointment as an officer in the Regular Navy shall, upon the revocation of temporary appointment as an officer, be deemed to have reverted to his former status in the Fleet Naval Reserve, and shall be entitled to retain pay at the same rate he was receiving prior to discharge from the Fleet Naval Reserve from the rate he is herein deemed to have reverted to his former status therein: Provided, That reenlistment in the Navy following revocation of temporary appointment as an officer shall not deprive him of the benefits of this section and he shall be entitled to receive the pay, including retainer pay, authorized for members of the Fleet Naval Reserve when on active duty during the period served under enlistment.

That enlisted men of the Navy who were discharged at expiration of enlistment and had completed 16 or 20 years' service at time of discharge, and were thereafter enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force and assigned provisional rank as warrant or commissioned officers, shall be deemed to have been transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve on date of discharge from the Navy, and then to have been transferred to the class of the Naval Reserve Force in which they were given provisional assignment as warrant or commissioned officers: Provided, That they shall be entitled to receive the same pay, allowances, and other benefits from and after the date said transfer to the Fleet Naval Reserve is herein deemed to have been made as is provided by law for men transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve.

That any enlisted man who was discharged from the Navy to enable him to be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force in a commissioned rank, who was thereafter at his own request reduced to the same rating in the Naval Reserve Force as held by him at the time of his discharge from the Navy, and transferred to the Regular Navy to serve the unexpired portion of his enrollment, in accordance with the act approved July 11, 1919, shall be entitled, from the date he was so transferred and so long as he shall continue in the naval service, to the same rate of pay and other benefits that would have been received by him if he had not been discharged from the Navy to permit enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking some member of the committee to please explain the effect of section 3. It is rather a long section. I have endeavored to figure out just what its effect would be.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, in the war we had three organizations. This legislation relates altogether to the enlisted personnel. We had the enlisted personnel in the regular Navy; then we had the enlisted personnel of the Naval Reserve, in which there were six divisions, but we called it all the "Naval Reserve." Then we had a temporary organization in the Navy in the commissioned personnel as well as in the Regular Navy. Now, it occurred that men were picked out of the Navy, enlisted men, who were well qualified, and because of their fitness were selected and given temporary commissions. At the expiration of the temporary commission of such a man he went back into the enlisted personnel. The comptroller rules that, having gone out of the enlisted personnel of the Navy and gone into a commissioned rank, he lost the benefit of his continuous service, and when he went back into the enlisted personnel he went in as on a first enlistment. Now, then, a man in the Naval Reserve who was a deserving man was picked out for a commission. He served in a commissioned rank, and at the expiration of the commission, when he went back into the Naval Reserve, the same ruling was made as to him. He lost the benefit of his continuous service. All of this section 3 is intended to meet the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. WALSH. Is that all that is done?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all. It is to remedy and correct this, and to preserve for them the benefits they would have had under existing law if they had remained in the positions they held in the enlisted personnel and had not taken these preferences and these commissioned ranks.

Mr. WALSH. Does it call for any increase in the personnel of the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. None whatever.

Mr. WALSH. Or any increase in the appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. PADGETT. None whatever.

Mr. WALSH. It is just legislation?

Mr. PADGETT. Pure and simple.

Mr. WALSH. Legislation to overcome the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury, and to permit men to be restored to their former enlisted status, and have them go along with continuous service as though they had not been out of the enlisted service?

Mr. PADGETT. That is it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized. Mr. McKENZIE. You had, as I understand it, the Regular Navy, the Fleet Naval Reserve, and the Naval Reserve?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. The Naval Reserve is the general name, and the Fleet Naval Reserve is one of the six general divisions of the Naval Reserve Force. The Naval Reserve Force is the generic name, and the Fleet Naval Reserve is one branch of it.

Mr. McKENZIE. As I understand it, an enlisted man in the Navy who has had considerable experience and might have held some higher grade, not a commissioned officer, as I understand it, but a higher grade in the enlisted personnel, could be selected and be given a commission in one of these subordinate branches?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. He served for a certain length of time. When the war was over and the commissioned personnel had to be reduced he wanted to go back in his old place in the enlisted personnel.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. The commissioned personnel was reduced, and he came back to his enlisted place, and he could not get there. The comptroller ruled that he came in as a new recruit, as if on a first enlistment.

Mr. McKENZIE. The question I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee is this: Do these men who were given this commissioned status when they go back into the enlisted branch of the Navy get credit for the length of time served in the commissioned service, to be added to their enlisted service, to be computed in connection with their increase of pay?

Mr. PADGETT. My impression is that they do.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not that one of the real things behind it? I am not quarreling with the committee about it. First, it will give them the right to go back to their old status, and, second, they will not be charged up with loss of time while serving as commissioned officers?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Otherwise such a man would lose the benefit of all the promotion he may have earned during his service. For instance, a man has served 16 years. That is four enlistments. He gets a little increase of pay with each enlistment. After the first enlistment, I believe, under the order of President Roosevelt fixing the rate of pay, he got $5 increase on his second enlistment, and on each one after that he got $3 a month increase. Now, when he was selected because of his efficiency and given this temporary promotion and a commission and surrenders his commission and comes back, the comptroller rules that he has to start back all over again as a first-enlisted man. That was not right. To remedy this in the different forms is the sole purpose of section 3.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. I could not hear all that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] stated. The little I heard was along the lines of the report. I think the House is quite willing to do the thing that the gentleman has stated. But, frankly, we have been fooled several times by legislation coming from the Navy Department. We were badly fooled a year or so ago and enacted some legislation that I think nobody in the House knowingly voted for. Now, I want to be sure, if I may, that there is no joker in this provision.

Mr. PADGETT. If there is any there, I do not know it, and I have no reason to suspect it.

Mr. MANN. That is not the question. I know if the gentleman knew it he would have told us. I want to know if somebody has investigated this provision enough to know whether there is a joker in it.

Mr. PADGETT. We tried to investigate it, and the Secretary of the Navy has written a letter setting out and explaining the purposes and aims of it. We had officers appear before us, and we went into it as fully as we could.

Mr. MANN. I asked several members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they said they did not know anything about it.

Mr. PADGETT. We had hearings upon it.

Mr. MANN. That may be.

Mr. PADGETT. I think it is entirely bona fide and is justified.

Mr. BUTLER. I have sat and listened to the testimony, and I thought I understood it.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman sure he understands it?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not sure. This is complicated legislation. We inquired whether or not it was for the purpose of reaching certain objects, and we were well satisfied from the examination we made of it. I want to assure my friend that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], who wrote this act, is very familiar with it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, all these acts are really written up in the Navy Department. I have read the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, but of course he himself did not write it. I do not know who wrote it. Probably some very estimable gentleman. Yet sometimes these things are slipped through without our knowledge. Now, no one here pretends to be very familiar with this subject except my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. If he will assure me that there is not anything hidden in this, after his careful investigation, that is enough; but I do not want him to say we passed this simply because we received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, written by some one in the department at the instance of a clerk or officer down along the line somewhere. Are any commissioned officers involved in this anywhere?

Mr. PADGETT. It relates only to the enlisted personnel.

Mr. MANN. The paragraph on page 7, beginning on line 5, does that relate in any way to commissioned officers?

Mr. PADGETT. It reads:

That any member of the Fleet Naval Reserve, transferred thereto after 16 or 20 years' service in the Navy, who has heretofore been discharged therefrom to accept temporary appointment as an officer in the Regular Navy shall, upon the revocation of temporary appointment as an officer, be deemed to have reverted to his former status in the Fleet Naval Reserve, and shall be entitled to retainer pay at the same rate he was receiving prior to discharge from the Fleet Naval Reserve from the date he is herein deemed to have reverted to his former status therein.

And so forth. My understanding is, sir, that that relates altogether to the enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve that have been transferred in order to get temporary commissions.

Mr. BUTLER. And now they go back.

Mr. MANN. Where they use an officer of the Regular Navy, that is a temporary appointment, I understand.

Mr. PADGETT. These are members of the Fleet Naval Reserve. They were not in the Regular Navy.

Mr. MANN. I know, but this provides that where they do become regular officers in the Navy—

Mr. PADGETT. That was temporary. That was under the act of May 22, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURTON). The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to cause to be prepared in the Office of Naval Operations, Navy Department, a publication known as the Shipping Bulletin, and to publish and furnish the same to the maritime interests of the United States and other interested parties, at the cost of collecting and publishing the information, including the cost of printing and paper and other necessary expenses. The expenses of such bulletin shall be paid from the appropriation "Engineering," Bureau of Engineering. The money received from the sale of such publication shall be credited to appropriation "Engineering."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HICKS: Page 9, line 11, after the word "bulletin," insert "for the entire fiscal year 1922."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a statement in regard to this paragraph, in order that gentlemen may know its purpose. During the war the Navy Department published a document known as the Shipping Bulletin, which contained information pertaining to the movements of vessels all over the seas. It was done in order that the Navy Department could make up their convoys and could better handle the war situation afloat. This Shipping Bulletin was published confidentially at that time. Then when the war terminated requests were made from chambers of commerce, insurance men, and shipping men generally, owners of ships, as well as owners of cargoes, that this bulletin should be continued, because of the information that was contained therein. At first it was a mere typewritten circular. Then it was printed by presses and was issued entirely free, the expense being charged to the Bureau of Engineering of the Navy Department. In November, 1919, the head of the Bureau of Engineering in the Navy Department objected to having the expense charged to his bureau, so the Secretary of the Navy made an arrangement with the Printing Committee by which the printing of it should be done by the Government in the city of New York, and copies were to be sold at cost, which was figured at 70 cents per copy. A provision was inserted in one of the deficiency acts of 1920 providing that the Bulletin should be published for one year, terminating June 30, 1921, at the cost of printing, paper, and so forth. The work has gone forward and 400 subscribers are now on the lists, but the limit of time has expired, and so this paragraph is inserted in order to carry it along for a further period. At first they charged 50 cents a copy. That was too low. Then they estimated the cost at 70 cents a copy, but that was too low. Now they estimate that the cost will be in the neighborhood of $1.18 a copy. In February of this year the price was raised to $1. The two amendments I have offered are for the purpose of legalizing the publication since July 1, 1921, and the other to limit its publication for one year, for, at the end of that time, it may be thought advisable to place its publication in some other department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What information does the bulletin contain?

Mr. HICKS. This bulletin contains a statement of the movements of every ship on the seas, their arrival in port, their clearing, and their location at sea. It is published every morning, in the city of New York, Sundays and holidays excepted, and the city of New York, realizing the importance of the project, have allowed the Government Printing Office there the free use of a building, the Government supplying only heat and light, in addition to the tabulation and printing costs. The Government owns the printing presses, and the bulletin is printed under the authority of the Printing Committee. I will say that the reason why the Government is publishing this bulletin is because no private enterprise will undertake it. Effort has been made to interest private concerns, but without success. I personally feel that the Government should keep out of business as much as possible, but here is something which the shipping interests need, small shipowners and shippers as well as large ones, and no private concern will publish it because the costs are prohibitive.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HICKS. I should like to finish my statement. Why will no private concern publish this bulletin? Because of the cost. You may say, "Well, if it would cost an individual a large amount, it must cost the Government a large amount." I will explain that. Nearly all this information comes by radio from Government agents. For instance, a vessel on the high seas will radio its location in latitude and longitude. The owners of vessels want to know about their ships, and the radio message is sent free. If the vessel is in the North Atlantic the message will be picked up by a Government radio plant somewhere north of Norfolk and by it transmitted to the office in the city of New York. There is no expense attached to the land transmission, because the Government owns these radio plants. If these messages are picked up around the Gulf or South Atlantic they are received at some navy yard in the South and are then transmitted from that navy yard, if conditions permit, to the radio plant in New York. If conditions do not permit this they will be sent by telegraph at Government rates.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKS. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. DOWELL. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. HICKS. I will be happy to answer all questions if I first get an opportunity to make a statement of what this bulletin does and how it is made up, because I think the gentlemen would like to hear about it. A great deal of the information, of course, comes from the Pacific Ocean. We have a radio plant at Cavite, which is the central radio station in the Orient. We have one at Peking, one at Samoa, one at Vladivostok, one in Hawaii. Wherever they collect this information it is sent from that point to these central offices and from there transmitted via Pearl Harbor and San Diego to New York. There is no expense between Government stations, for we own and operate the stations. The only expense we have in the Orient is for cabling from Yokohama, Hongkong, Kobe, or Shanghai to Cavite or Peking. In South American waters and ports the messages go via cable or telegraph to Balboa, and thence by radio to New York. In Europe the arrangements are even better. By reciprocal arrangements with the French Government there is a free exchange of official messages between our radio plants and the Lafayette station at Bordeaux. All European news is transmitted to Bordeaux at special rates and then to New York. This news is collected by consular agents, attachés, and other officials, whose salaries are already provided for, and there is no expense in collecting; this is the reason the Government can do this work and no private concern can, for a private concern would have to pay for the collecting as well as the transmission of the information. Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that simply because this news comes by Government radio it does not cost anything?

Mr. HICKS. The cost is too small to estimate, for these stations are maintained by the Government and they will be maintained anyway whether you strike this item from the bill or not.

Mr. WALSH. Is that included in the cost of the publication of the book?

Mr. HICKS. No. The costs include the transmission of messages when sent outside Government stations, the cost of publication, and the salaries of employees. There are 41 civilian employees engaged in this work—editor, typesetters, printers, and five officers of the Navy give about one-twentieth of their time to the publication, and the rest of their time is given to regular naval work. There is no enlisted man engaged in the work at all. The pay of the officers is not included in the cost of publication.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand the gentleman to say that the great shipping interests want this publication. That is true, is it not?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It will enable them to keep track of all vessels and small competitors, and know what they are doing.

Mr. HICKS. Every chamber of commerce wants it and every insurance company wants it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is immaterial. It will enable every great shipping company—and there are some of great power—to keep track of every tramp steamer and every other steamer of every other company, small or large, to know exactly what they are doing.

Mr. HICKS. What is the idea?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The idea is that in these days of intense competition we find some great corporations in the United States hiring men to get secrets from the books and to reveal who their competitors' customers are.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman wants to ask a question, I would be willing to answer, but I do not want him to make a speech in my time, because there are other gentlemen who want to ask questions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman asked me what my idea was about it.

Mr. HICKS. I decline to yield further.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Has this been published since the 1st of July of this year?

Mr. HICKS. It has.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. By what authority?

Mr. HICKS. I do not know, and I am afraid no authority exists.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Under what authority was it published before the deficiency act was passed?

Mr. HICKS. I think by some sort of a gentleman's agreement between Mr. Daniels and some of the committees of Congress.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It was published in utter defiance of law, there is no question about that.

Mr. HICKS. It may have been.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It is published daily in New York. What value is the information published in New York to a man on the Pacific coast or a man on the Gulf?

Mr. HICKS. If he cares for it, he can have the information telegraphed to him at his own expense.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In other words, the man outside of New York has to pay for the information, while the great shipping interests and the insurance companies in New York get it at the Government expense.

Mr. HICKS. I want to say that some of the most urgent requests for the continuation of the publication come from Boston, New Orleans, Mobile, and from Chicago. New York happens to be the shipping center of America, and it would seem appropriate to publish it where the demand was greatest.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. What was the actual cost of printing the document?

Mr. HICKS. The cost of printing the document for the fiscal year 1921 was $128,621 and the receipts were $59,457, but this included seven months when the Bulletin was sold for 50 cents per copy.

Mr. DOWELL. Per annum?

Mr. HICKS. For the last year.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the circulation?

Mr. HICKS. The circulation is 400.

Mr. DOWELL. The Government is paying this amount of money to furnish the information to 400 subscribers?

Mr. HICKS. That is the present circulation. But I want to repeat that we received about $60,000 from subscriptions. With the price at $1 we will probably get all the expense back, with the exception perhaps of 18 cents a copy.

Mr. DOWELL. With this expenditure of $128,000, that does not include all of the expenditures; you have a number of officers who devote their time to preparing it?

Mr. HICKS. One-twentieth of the time of five officers.

Mr. DOWELL. You have five officers devoting one-twentieth of their time, and, of course, they have clerical assistance?

Mr. HICKS. Clerical assistance is included in the costs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out section 5. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Page 9, beginning at line 4, strike out section 5.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is the duty of the Government to issue publications of this kind. It is not a governmental function. In the second place, it is not the duty of the Navy Department to engage in furnishing information purely of commercial vessels. This publication is now being issued without authority. They obtained authority of the printing commission under provisions of the law for the publication of this bulletin last year. But there is a provision of law under which they may not continue unless they have express authority from the Printing Committee. In the past there were some 500 or 1,000 publications issued by different bureaus of the Government until the things grew so nasty that it smelled to everybody. [Applause.] We have tried to curb it. These various branches of the Government have been seeking to override the commission which has jurisdiction over the latter and obtain direct legislative authority where the commission could not interfere with it. The Navy Department is not the first one that has proposed that a certain publication issued by them should be legalized by Congress. The boldness of this proposition, I must say, excites my admiration. There is no limit on the cost, no requirement that the expense shall be met by the receipts of the publication—just a provision that out of the total appropriation for the Bureau of Engineering, which amounts to many millions of dollars a year, they may spend as much as they want to publishing information for persons with whom they have no connection. The main purpose of this publication is not to furnish information. The main purpose of the publication is to give an excuse for employing men in the radio stations under the Navy Department, and when they are able to say that Congress has directed them to issue a publication for the mercantile interests, then they have every excuse for adding to their appropriations for the personnel in the radio stations.

Mr. Chairman, I am tired of having these departments of the Government seeking to extend their authority, their jurisdiction, their personnel, and their pay for things which are not their functions. [Applause.] The Navy Department is properly engaged in building up and maintaining a Navy, and if they will do that well, they will do better than they have done heretofore, without branching out. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take issue with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in regard to this publication, but I think it would be a great mistake at the present time to stop the publication. Undoubtedly it is of use to the mercantile interests. Undoubtedly it is needed at the present time. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] in speaking a few minutes ago said this gave the larger operators information as to what the small operators were doing. It also gives the small operators information as to what the large operators are doing. It also gives the American operators information as to what foreign ships are doing and where they are going. Just at the present time it is a useful publication to the Merchant Marine of the United States. It may not be of use at a later date. We have a lot of young men in business who want this information, who use it. There are probably only four or five hundred people in the United States who want the publication. No man would be justified in publishing it, and it would be up to the Government or to some department of the Government to publish this for the use of these people. It may be possible that in 5 or 10 years from now, when these men get full knowledge of the shipping business of the world, they can do without the publication, but I believe at the present time it would be an error to stop it.

The gentleman from Illinois knows well that nobody has more opposed the entry of the Navy into the radio activities of the country than I have myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. In one second. I do not believe they should be in the radio business. I do not believe they ever had any right to take the radio stations and purchase them as they did, but they are there, and they are doing the business, and the only way to get this information is through the Navy Department at the present time.

Let us hope that at some future time the shipping interests will grow large enough to take care of this themselves without asking the Government to do it. I yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. How long has this publication been running?

Mr. EDMONDS. It has been running, I think, now for about three years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. And it costs $128,000 a year to publish it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and during the war it was considered very useful by the Army and the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Its direct benefits, except to the Navy and the Government, inure to whom?

Mr. EDMONDS. The merchant marine gets the benefit of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. What other individual?

Mr. EDMONDS. No other individuals.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The merchant marine do not want 400 copies of it, do they?

Mr. EDMONDS. Those are all of the big shipping men there are in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. There are a great many people engaged in the shipping business. They do not pay for it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; they do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. As I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks], he admitted that this publication is running in violation of law, and that it costs $128,000 a year. What does the gentleman say about that?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not answer that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The gentleman does not know?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know whether it is published in violation of law or not. Since the 1st of July it has been published in violation of law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does the gentleman agree with the gentleman from New York that we ought to pay for something that has been done in violation of law?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman desire to answer the question?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Go ahead.

Mr. HICKS. During Mr. Daniels's period of office he thought he was not justified in going ahead with this publication, and he had a communication with Senator Smoot. They sort of made a gentleman's agreement to go ahead with the thing. I think that is the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

MANN], as I do frequently, whenever he moves to strike out a paragraph to prevent extravagance and waste of public money. The paragraph ought to be stricken out, and this unauthorized expenditure of money stopped.

But I want to use this occasion to say something in behalf of the present Public Printer. Mr. George H. Carter, who now presides over the Government Printing Office, is a most efficient public official and a splendid gentleman. I am a partisan Democrat, but I must say that conditions have changed down there since the 4th day of last March, and changes for the better are continuing there almost every day. In a very short time the Public Printer will have the Government Printing Office run on a strictly business basis, in behalf of all of the people of the United States, as it is no longer to be run by a particular clique or class of individuals for selfish interests. I take my hat off to Mr. Carter. Even though I am a most partisan Democrat, I am glad to hail him as the successor of the former official.

Why am I rejoicing, Mr. Chairman? It is because that until now our Government Printing Office has been run as a "closed shop" wherein only union men with cards were welcome and could work for any length of time, as life there was made so unpleasant and unbearable to all employees who refused to join the union and pay to it their regular dues, such employees were unable to withstand long the "silent treatment," ostracism, and assaults upon their efficiency records.

I received the following letter from an employee of the Printing Office:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1921.

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Representative from Texas, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am an employee of the Government Printing Office, being a compositor on the seventh floor. I have held such position continuously for about two years. I receive 75 cents per hour, plus the $240 a year bonus.

Against my will I was forced to join the union, as I was given to understand by employees that I could not hold my job long in the Government Printing Office without it. In addition to the 5 per cent assessment that comes out of our salary each month, one-half of which goes as dues to our local, we have been assessed an additional 10 per cent to pay the expense of the strikes that have been going on over the United States in behalf of the 44-hour week, for which our union is contending.

I deemed the oath to my union, which I was compelled to take when I joined, contrary to the pledges I made in my oath to my Government, which I took at the time I entered the service.

Mr. Flanagan, who is chapel secretary for our union, likewise works for the Government, and makes a practice of going among the men during business hours and collecting dues. When the first payment of assessments in June was due, I refused to pay same, as I felt that same was an imposition. On last Friday, during business hours, Mr. Flanagan, the chapel chairman, advised me that unless I paid my assessments to the union I could not work in the Government Printing Office any longer. While a number of employees do not carry cards in the union any longer, the union makes it so unpleasant that work there is practically unbearable. I appeal to Congress to see that we are not further molested.

Very truly, yours,

MILLARD FRENCH.

I was greatly surprised, Mr. Chairman, at the contents of said letter, inasmuch as I had received on May 25, 1921, the following communication from the Public Printer, to wit:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, May 25, 1921.

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am pleased to acknowledge receipt of your letters of May 13 and 24, asking to be advised as to whether the Government Printing Office is run on the "open-shop" basis and whether an order was issued by the President making this office an "open-shop."

I regret very much that owing to the demand on my time by important investigations and personal illness during the past week I have been unable until now to comply with your request. I trust, therefore, that you will pardon my delay in this instance.

Every position in the Government Printing Office, except that of the Public Printer, his private secretary, and certain laborers employed under an Executive order during the war, is under the civil service. Accordingly, with these exceptions, every appointment has to be made from lists of persons who have passed the competitive examinations as held under the direction of the Civil Service Commission. As you undoubtedly know, the eligible list is made up by the Civil Service Commission in the order of the ratings made on the examinations, and the appointing officer has to make his selection from groups of three in the order that the names appear on such eligible list.

As far as I know, and to the best of my belief, the question of whether a person belongs to a labor organization or not is not considered by the Civil Service Commission in conducting its examinations or preparing its lists of eligible applicants for positions in the Government service. No inquiry is made by this office as to whether persons eligible for appointment are or are not members of labor organizations. Their eligibility for appointment is determined solely by the civil-service requirements. Nor is there any rule that an employee shall or shall not belong to a labor organization in order to retain his position in the Government Printing Office. If by the term "open shop" you mean a place where a person may be employed regardless of whether he belongs to a labor organization, then I presume the Government Printing Office may be called an "open shop" under the system of appointments through the civil service, as I have above stated.

It is but fair to advise you, however, that I have been informed that most of the employees in the skilled trades of the Government Printing Office do belong to their respective labor organizations. Such membership, I assume, is a matter entirely in their own discretion. I take it that they have the same right to become affiliated in trade organizations as we have to join the various religious and fraternal organizations that may seem beneficial to us.

In regard to an Executive order making the Government Printing Office an "open shop," I presume that you refer to the action of President Roosevelt which was prompted by the so-called "Miller case" in 1903. W. A. Miller, who was a bindery foreman in the Government Printing Office, was reported to have been dismissed at that time by the then Public Printer following Miller's expulsion from the local union of bookbinders. The Civil Service Commission refused to recognize Miller's expulsion as a just ground for his removal from the Government Printing Office and requested the Public Printer to reassign him to duty. In ordering the reinstatement of Miller, President Roosevelt said in his letter of July 13, 1903, to Secretary Cortelyou of the Department of Commerce and Labor, whom he had directed to investigate the matter that—

"On the face of the papers presented Miller would appear to have been removed in violation of law. There is no objection to the employees of the Government Printing Office constituting themselves into a union if they so desire; but no rules or resolutions of that union can be permitted to override the laws of the United States, which it is my sworn duty to enforce.

"Please communicate a copy of this letter to the Public Printer for his information and that of his subordinates."

Miller was accordingly reinstated by the Public Printer and returned to his work in the Government Printing Office.

President Roosevelt is quoted as having further defined his position to a committee of labor men who called upon him on September 29, 1903, in regard to the Miller case, as follows:

"As regards the Miller case, I have little to add to what I have already said. In dealing with it I ask you to remember that I am dealing purely with the relation of the Government to its employees. I must govern my action by the laws of the land, which I am sworn to administer, and which differentiate any case in which the Government of the United States is a party from all other cases whatsoever. These laws are enacted for the benefit of the whole people, and can not and must not be construed as permitting discrimination against some of the people. I am President of all of the people of the United States without regard to creed, color, birthplace, occupation, or social condition. My aim is to do equal and exact justice as among them all. In the employment and dismissal of men in the Government service I can no more recognize the fact that a man does or does not belong to a union as being for or against him than I can recognize the fact that he is a Protestant or a Catholic, a Jew or a gentile, as being for or against him.

"In the communications sent me by various labor organizations protesting against the retention of Miller in the Government Printing Office the grounds alleged are twofold: (1) That he is a nonunion man. (2) That he is not personally fit. The question of his personal fitness is one to be settled in the routine of administrative detail, and can not be allowed to conflict with or to complicate the larger question of governmental discrimination for or against him or any other man because he is or is not a member of a union. This is the only question now before me for decision, and as to this my decision is final."

Trusting that this statement furnishes the information you desire, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

GEORGE H. CARTER,
Public Printer.

I judged, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the rule in the Miller case inaugurated by the great Theodore Roosevelt would be understood by all employees to be again in full force and effect, and that they would quit hounding men into joining the union against their will. So immediately upon the receipt of the letter from Mr. Millard French, who has a wife and five little children to support, I sent it to the Public Printer in order that he might be apprised of what was going on in the Government Printing Office, and I requested him to protect this employee from further persecution. I received the following reply:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, July 23, 1921.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am pleased to acknowledge receipt of your letters of July 15, 20, and 22, relative to the reports you have received concerning activities of labor organizations in this office, especially as to the case of Millard French.

Upon receipt of your letter of the 20th, I at once called for Mr. French and had what appeared to be a satisfactory talk with him. I understood then that he was going to advise you as to my position in the matter, which seemed to meet with his approval.

I have also talked with Mr. Flanagan, in regard to whom Mr. French made his complaint, and several other employees of the shop who I thought might have some knowledge of the alleged activities of the organizations to which you referred. I called their attention to the letter which I addressed to you under date of May 25, 1921, and the statement of President Roosevelt which I quoted therein. I informed these employees that I am in full accord with the views of President Roosevelt on this subject. Mr. Flanagan denied to me that he had told Mr. French that the latter "could not work in the Government Printing Office any longer" if he did not pay his union dues. I advised him and the other employees with whom I talked that I will not permit any intimidation of the employees in this office and that the working time of the shop can not be used for other than the business of the Government. I received assurances that my directions would be complied with and that there will be no ground for further complaint.

Thanking you for calling the matter to my attention, I beg to remain,

Sincerely, yours,

GEORGE H. CARTER,
Public Printer.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, it took a great amount of courage for our Public Printer to write the above letter. If he had not been a man of sterling character, courage, and integrity, he could not have written it. And I want every employee in the Government Printing Office to note that when the Public Printer said—

I will not permit any intimidations of the employees in this office, and the working time of the shop can not be used for other than the business of the Government—he proclaimed to the Nation that the American "open shop" has again been established in at least one bureau of our Government.

And I want all of the employees of the Government in the Printing Office to understand that if they object to the oath of the union, which puts the union above fraternity, God, and country, they have the right to withdraw from the union and still hold their jobs. And I want all of the Government employees in the Printing Office to understand that if they object to paying this extra 10 per cent assessment that has been levied against their salary as dues to the union to carry on the Typographical Union's strikes all over the United States for a 44-hour week they can stop paying that tremendous drain on their salary, withdraw from the union, and still hold their job with the Government. It is optional with them entirely. If they believe that every able-bodied man ought to work 48 hours instead of only 44 hours each week of 168 hours and that the demand by his union for a 44-hour week is unjust, they have a perfect right to quit the union and quit paying for the expense of its unjust strikes.

We are reminded, Mr. Chairman, that in June, 1918, during the war, when the various unions of the Government employees demanded the first $120 bonus that was granted to them, the Borland amendment was passed requiring these Government employees to work eight hours instead of only seven hours a day during the war when drawing their $120 bonus. This was in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which with these provisions went to the President in plenty of time for him to sign it so that it would become a law by July 1, 1918, the beginning of the new fiscal year. These unions of Government employees, headed by Mr. Samuel Gompers, immediately besieged President Wilson with demands that he veto this bill, so that they could still work only seven instead of eight hours per day. They were willing to wreck the whole bill to keep from working eight hours a day during war time. We then had over a million soldiers in the trenches of France, receiving only $33 per month and working sometimes 24 hours a day out of the 24, and would have been shot against a brick wall in everlasting dishonor had they even murmured. Yet these unions of Government employees in Washington demanded that the President veto a big supply bill, so that they be not compelled to work eight hours a day, but could continue working only seven hours, when that 8-hour provision at the same time granted them a bonus of $120 each.

On the front page of the Washington Herald for Saturday, June 29, 1918, appeared a column of protest against the 8-hour provision and the demands of the union for the President to veto the bill. On the same front page appeared a long article from J. G. Gurley, a union official, headed in large letters, "President—Veto! Veto! Clerks' Plea," which article was concluded on page 2 thereof. And on page 3 of such issue was a double 2-column article signed by H. M. McLarin, president National Federation of Federal Employees, 410 A. F. of L. Building, and heading same with a quotation from Samuel Gompers in huge letters, as follows: "Borland's plan damnable—Gompers." "Mass meeting in protest, Sunday, June 30, 1918, at 2.30 p. m.," and after a long harangue, ending up with the following:

Now is the time to organize for the present and the future to prevent profiteering in labor and to secure justice. There is no other way. Do something for yourself, your family, and your fellows.

The above also appeared on page 4 of the Washington Post June 29, 1918. And on the front page of the Washington Herald for Sunday, June 30, 1921, appeared another column of protest, in which was stated:

A great mass meeting will be held to-day at Masonic Temple.

The question will be discussed from all angles.

On Monday, if Congress does not adjourn, a great mass meeting of 10,000 Federal employees will meet Congress to request 15 per cent additional pay for the additional hour and to give time and a half pay for all work overtime.

And, Mr. Chairman, promptly on Monday, July 1, 1918, in response to the demands made by Mr. Samuel Gompers and the Government employees, the President did veto said entire bill and sent it back, saying:

To the House of Representatives:

Though I realize very keenly the inconvenience to the Government of returning without my signature H. R. 10358, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, I feel constrained to do so because of the provision contained in the last paragraph of the bill, which increases the hours of work for the employees of the Government within the District of Columbia from seven to eight hours per day.

And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, I honestly and sincerely believe that it was this truckling to class interests and selfishness during the war that more than anything else caused the people to take the reins of Government from the hands of my party. And the typographical union ought to take a lesson from this circumstance and abandon its foolish 44-hour week and call off all of its strikes and tell its men to go back to work. Let me remind the Government employees that besides said $120 bonus they have since then drawn from the Government four other bonuses of $240 each, drawn by all employees with salaries up to and including $2,500 per year. And our ex-service men, who brought a world victory back from France, have been denied their bonus.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want our worthy and efficient Public Printer to know just exactly what is going on in his Government Printing Office. I have received this morning another communication from another employee in the Government Printing Office who does not want to disclose his name, and he states:

1. A printer goes into the shop ignorant that it is closed to nonunion men. Immediately after he is assigned work he is approached by the "walking delegate" (using Government time) and asked for his "card." If he hasn't one, he is told that this is a union shop; that everyone in the shop carries a card.
2. If he delays taking out a card, which costs all the way from $5 up to $25, pressure in every conceivable manner is brought to bear till life is made unbearable, and if sensible of injustice a condition is made to render honest work impossible. He is told by "voluntarily confidential" that he will not likely cross over the dead line of probational service (six months), and that he need not expect promotion without a card.
3. It is a safe estimate that seven-eighths of the force now in the Government Printing Office have been forced to join the union, one by one, as they come in the shop.
4. The "walking delegate" collects dues during work hours from a list made up from the Government time slip, and if working in pairs his partner is idle during this time.
5. The "walking delegate" calls time to commence and quit work.
6. This appointed agent of the union can and does assess fines for any infraction of the union rules.
7. Girl helpers and laborers are told by the "walking delegate" that they will be taken care of in preference to nonmembers.
8. It is an open secret that the "walking delegate" in some divisions has more to say in the conduct and control than the authorized foreman.
9. The regular union dues are 2 per cent of all earnings; old-age pension, 2½ per cent of all earnings; and for the "strike assessment," 10 per cent of all earnings—total, 14 per cent of every dollar earned by a printer. Every printer pays the union each month approximately $25.
10. If the 44-hour "strike" is won, no Government employee can benefit by it, even if he favored it.
11. Bulletin boards in every division are plastered with union bulletins that would tend to intimidate and hold in line weak members.
12. In arguments over the "strike" more than one printer has been heard to say: "I hold my allegiance to the union above that of the Government."
13. The secretary of the Washington City union is sick. "Spadge" Parsons, foreman of the monotype section (day), Government Printing Office, is acting in his stead. If a printer refuses to "take out a card," this man (Parsons) is in the dual capacity of "secretary of the union" that says "keep him out" and that of a sworn Government official passing on his qualifications at the end of six months' probational service.
14. The obligation required to enter the Government service and that required by the union are at entire variance; hence the closed condition of the Government print shop forces every employee to indirectly perjure himself.

Mr. Chairman, we all ought to rejoice that the Public Printer has ordered all of the above evils stopped; and I give notice now to the union employees in the Government Printing Office that if they keep up these evils, if they persecute any more men who withdraw from the union with their "silent treatment" and their insults, calling them "rats" or other names, I am going to find it out and report it to the Public Printer and have them answer for it; and they are not going to interfere with their efficiency records, either.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on conditions existing in the Government Printing Office.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on the subject indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Would he state in his extension of remarks that the Public Printer comes from the great State of Iowa?

Mr. BLANTON. I shall be very happy to do so. He does come from Iowa and does great honor and credit to that State.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I think that that amendment better be reported again because it legalizes the expenditure for this bulletin, made since the 1st of July.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object. We all know what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Hicks) there were—ayes 20, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 70, noes 25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the naval appropriation act approved June 4, 1920, is hereby amended so that any chaplain in the Naval Reserve Force who was more than 50 years of age on the date of said act and who now holds the confirmed rank of commander may be transferred to and appointed in the same permanent grade and rank in the Regular Navy not in the line of promotion and not eligible for retirement: Provided, That any chaplain transferred to the Regular Navy in accordance with this authorization shall be wholly retired without pay upon attaining the age of 64 years, or becoming physically incapacitated for active duty: Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall operate to increase the number of chaplains with the rank of commander as now authorized by law.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will give me their attention for a few minutes. It is perhaps not well to say it, but I do say it, that I take more interest in this section than any I have voted for since I have been in the Congress. This provides, without cost to the Government, a continuation in the military service of the Government of two men, one a chaplain at the station at Newport, the penal station at Newport, and the other is the chaplain at Quantico, below here. Both of these men came into the service in 1917. They are both about 50 years of age, indeed, they are 58. They left their churches and they spent their time in the service, and it is earnestly requested that they might remain until they are 64 years of age, then to leave the service without pay of any kind or sort, without retirement, and if they should become incapacitated in the meantime they will be discharged without retirement. There are—

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. With pleasure. There are—let me finish this sentence—64 vacancies for chaplains in the service. In this grade there are 28 vacancies. This provides there shall be no increase in the number, no increase in the salary. Now, before I give the reason why I ask earnestly for you to allow this section to remain in the bill I will yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. This provision that they shall not be eligible for retirement is upon the recommendation of the Navy Department and with the acquiescence of the gentlemen who will be the beneficiaries of this legislation?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentlemen who will be the beneficiaries, one of them especially, and I understand also the other, asks that it should be recommended in the bill that they should not be retired, but they should be permitted to hold their posts and shall not have the advantage of what is known as the retirement law.

Mr. MANN. There are two of these gentlemen?

Mr. BUTLER. Two.

Mr. MANN. Did my friend give their names?

Mr. BUTLER. They are both in the report. One was—

Mr. MANN. I would like to have it in the Record. Possibly it may be while I am here there will be a bill in Congress providing for the retirement of these men, and I would like to have the Record show that they stated they would not ask for it.

Mr. BUTLER. One is Chaplain Brokenshire and the other is Chaplain Niver. Chaplain Niver comes from Baltimore and Chaplain Brokenshire, who I do not know very well, was born in Canada and came to this country.

Mr. MANN. I would be willing to contribute toward a halo to both of these gentlemen if they stick to it.

Mr. BUTLER. Gentlemen, just one word. At Quantico, below here, they have a system of schools of education for the enlisted men. Many of you perhaps know it. I want to say this for Chaplain Niver, that largely the success of that camp belongs to him. The magnificent discipline of that camp belongs to the influence of this great chaplain. The enlisted men want him retained. He is a companion and he is a friend. He is the guiding hand of most of them spiritually and oftentimes physically. He is a man practically without means, and Chaplain Niver told me that he had some insurance which would perhaps carry him through the balance of his life. The enlisted men and officers have asked me to urge the Congress to permit this chaplain to remain and serve his time until he is 64. Gentlemen, understand it will cost the Government nothing. It does not add to the number of chaplains. There are 28 vacancies and he will simply take one of these vacancies. There are 64 chaplain vacancies now. This does not increase the number, but just simply permits a worthy man, who served through the war, who has done a service for humanity, who has the love and respect of the officers and men, to remain for the good of the personnel of this camp. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word partly for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. One of these chaplains is at Quantico?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FIELDS. This provision is recommended by the officer in command of that camp, is it not?

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to the gentleman he is my son, and it is the only thing he has ever asked me to do, and therefore I feel like doing it.

Mr. FIELDS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think it is well to say that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, under the circumstances, would not feel like saying for the Record. He is too modest to do so. I know of no officer in the military service of the Government whose recommendation would go further with me than the recommendation of the commanding officer at Quantico. [Applause.] During my 10 years of service upon the Committee on Military Affairs I have observed the actions of a great many of the military men of our Government, and I make this statement, not because I am in the presence of the worthy gentleman from Pennsylvania, whose son is the commanding officer at Quantico, but because the honest dictates of my conscience impel me to make it, that with all my experience with the military men of this country none surpass and I doubt if any equal Gen. Smedley Butler, the commanding officer at Quantico. [Applause.] I observed his work overseas in command of the camp at Brest, where much criticism had previously been made of the condition of the camp and the treatment of the men. Much of the criticism of conditions at Brest was no doubt well founded, but when Gen. Butler took charge conditions changed, and it was made one of the best camps in our overseas activities.

I will say in fairness to other officers that the much-complained-of conditions at Brest in the winter of 1918-19 were due in the main to the great flow of troops through that camp immediately after the armistice, when adequate preparations had not been made for them. No one knew that the armistice would come so soon, therefore no one was to blame for the lack of proper housing facilities and proper sanitation, which made conditions so deplorable. But these conditions were relieved with amazing rapidity by Gen. Butler after he took charge. I observed the work of other officers there, as I have observed their work in this country, and much of it was very splendid indeed. But if there was one officer who surpassed all others in holding a high standard of efficiency and at the same time getting his arms around the enlisted personnel of his command and his fingers upon their heart chords, it was Gen. Butler. [Applause.] If there was an organization anywhere in which this cussed social distinction was not practiced, it was in the organization under the command of Gen. Butler. [Applause.] That sort of thing is so repulsive to me that I feel it is only an act of justice on my part, when I find an officer who measures up to my ideals, to pay him my compliments whenever I have an opportunity to do so. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the President that a commissioned or warrant officer or an enlisted man with the charge of desertion now standing against him on the rolls and records of the Navy or Marine Corps has since such charge was entered served honorably in the war with the German Government, either in the military forces of the Allies or in other branches of the military service of the United States prior to November 11, 1918, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to cause an entry to be made on said rolls and records of the Navy or Marine Corps, relieving said officer or enlisted man of all the disabilities which he had heretofore or would hereafter suffer by virtue of said charge of desertion thus appearing against him; and upon such action being taken by the President, such officer or enlisted man shall be regarded as having been honorably discharged on the date the charge of desertion was entered against him: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall operate to entitle any officer or enlisted man to back pay or allowances of any kind.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask just what this paragraph is intended to accomplish.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, we divided up the work over yonder—

Mr. MONDELL. The thought I have in mind is this: From a hurried reading of the paragraph I understand it provides that if the charge of desertion stood against the name of an enlisted man or an officer, warrant or otherwise, prior to the war, if he served honorably with the Allies during the war, or in some other branch of the American service than the Navy, he is to have the charge of desertion removed?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing in the paragraph, as I read it, that would authorize the removal of the charge of desertion from a man who had served in the Navy prior to the war and who served in the Navy during the war. Now, this is supposed to be general legislation. If it is, it is wrong in that form. If its purpose is general, it ought to give the same relief to a man who deserted from the Navy before the war and served in the Navy during the war that it gives to a man who served in the Navy before the war and served with the Allies or in the Army during the war. Is it a fact that, written in general language, it is only intended to relieve one or two individual cases and is so drawn as to cover those cases and none others?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. MONDELL. Then why is it drawn in the way that I have indicated?

Mr. BUTLER. It was intended to be drawn for the relief of all enlisted men and officers who served in the Great War, who have had against them what I call a black mark, a mark for desertion, who afterwards obtained an honorable discharge. I will tell you the inducing feature.

Mr. MONDELL. My question does not go to the merit of the proposition necessarily, but why do you draw the paragraph so that it does not relieve a man of the charge of desertion if he served in the Navy or Marine Corps during the war?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I rather assume if a man deserted from the Navy he could not reenlist in the Navy as long as the charge stood against him.

Mr. MONDELL. He may have done so. He could not serve in any other branch of the American service if he told the truth.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The Army might not have his record, but the Navy would have.

Mr. BRITTEN. Let me suggest that it is barely possible that a man may have deserted from the Navy and reenlisted in the Navy under an assumed name, and if he did, and afterwards served throughout the war and was honorably discharged, I think the provisions of this bill should cover his case as well as the others.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it should. Assuming the provision is meritorious, it certainly ought to include the case of a man who served in the Navy or Marine Corps during the war, as well as the man who served with the Allies or in the Army.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman suggest an amendment there? It was intended to work as he has suggested.

Mr. LAYTON. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee to strike out the words "other branches" and place in lieu thereof the words "any branch."

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming think that will do it?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Delaware has not put his amendment in just the proper form, I think. If you would strike out the words "in other branches of"—

Mr. PADGETT. Not the word "in."

Mr. MONDELL. The words "other branches of."

Mr. BUTLER. What would you put in there?

Mr. MONDELL. Put in nothing. I move to amend by striking out, on page 10, line 10, the word "other," and, on line 11, the words "branches of."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONDELL: Page 10, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "other branches of."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the word "further" ought to be included there.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. It is never easy to amend hurriedly on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The suggestion has been made that the word "military" as written here may be construed in a narrow sense, as relating only to the Army, and therefore a somewhat different amendment is necessary.

Mr. MANN. While the gentleman is acting on that, I move to strike out "other branches" and insert in lieu thereof the words "any branch" and insert after the word "military" the words "and naval."

Mr. BUTLER. "Or Marine Corps."

Mr. MANN. "Or naval."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 10, line 10, at the end of the line, strike out "other branches" and insert in lieu thereof "any branch," and after the word "military," in line 11, insert the words "or naval."

Mr. BUTLER. I think you ought to put the Marine Corps in there, although it is a part of the naval service.

Mr. MANN. Is not the Marine Corps a branch of the naval service?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. Yet we always use the two names. They are used that way before.

Mr. PADGETT. I would insert "Navy or Marine Corps."

Mr. MANN. I would say "Army, Navy, or Marine Corps."

Mr. BUTLER. You could not put "Army" in there, but it is intended for all.

Mr. MANN. It would be easy enough to say "or in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States."

Mr. BUTLER. If we are not trespassing upon the jurisdiction of the Military Committee, that might be well.

Mr. MCKENZIE. The words "armed forces," as are used in various acts, would cover it.

Mr. MANN. I assume, probably without justification, that the original language was prepared in the Navy Department.

Mr. BUTLER. I confess I do not know where the language came from. I read it several times, and I thought it covered the situation. But we have no pride of authorship. If it could be amended to make it more certain it would be well. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] gave me the suggestion that, as drawn, it would not do exactly what we intended to do.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] covers the case.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. I would suggest to the gentleman that his amendment be in the language he suggested a moment ago, to strike out "other branches of the military service" and insert "Army, Navy, or Marine Corps," and then it will read, "or the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States," and that makes it clear beyond any dispute or any mistake of interpretation.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Tennessee is well posted. The two gentlemen ranking on the naval committee make the same suggestion, and I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks permission to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment: Strike out the words "other branches" and insert in lieu thereof—

Mr. PADGETT. "Other branches of the military service."

Mr. MANN. Wait a moment—"the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or other military service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 10, line 10, strike out the words "other branches" and insert "Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or other military service."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to insert, after the word "or," the words "Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or." That would cover the Coast Guard and the Lighthouse Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 10, line 10, after the word "or," insert the words "Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment by inserting, also, after the word "military," in line 10, the words "or naval," so that the amendment will include anybody who enlisted in either the military or naval forces of the Allies.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it will do that, anyhow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 10, line 10, after the word "military," insert the words "or naval."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I do not like to make a point of order, but I do not know how else to get at it. This is not an amendment to the amendment, but is a separate amendment to the bill and should be so presented.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a separate amendment if it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell until he hears the amendment read.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Did the Chair rule on the point of order of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman made a point of order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman did make a point of order on the ground that my amendment was not properly an amendment to the amendment, but that it should have been offered as a separate amendment.

Mr. TEMPLE. As a separate amendment to the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I desire to offer it as a separate amendment and have it pending.

Mr. MANN. I should like to have my amendment reported. I would like to modify it by inserting after the word "or" the words "in the."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 10, line 10, after the word "or," insert the words "in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or"—

So that as amended the lines will read:

served honorably in the war with the German Government either in the military forces of the Allies, or in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or in other branches of the military service of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 10, line 10, after the word "military," insert the words "or naval."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, more for information than anything else. Suppose charges are preferred against a man for desertion. He leaves his own country and goes over and joins the armies of the Allies and participates in the World War. The President is authorized to correct a military record. Does that apply to a man who has not been honorably discharged? I should like to get that information from the chairman.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I answer the gentleman?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not hear the gentleman's question. Will he please repeat it?

Mr. RAKER. Would this provision apply to a man who was court-martialed during the late war?

Mr. BUTLER. Men are often tried and acquitted. If so, they are honorably discharged; but if the court-martial determined that a man was guilty, then he would be dishonorably discharged and it would not cover him.

Mr. RAKER. This bill does not provide that a man must receive an honorable discharge. It says "served honorably."

Mr. BUTLER. Such officer or enlisted man who served honorably.

Mr. MONDELL. A man who served honorably is honorably discharged.

Mr. RAKER. I knew a man who was an officer over on the other side. He was a major. He served a year and a half. On armistice day he left for three days and for that he was court-martialed and discharged from the Army. The question is whether or not you intend to relieve only those who are honorably discharged.

Mr. BUTLER. Only those who got an honorable discharge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the limits of cost heretofore authorized and below enumerated are increased as follows: Battleship No. 44, from $12,750,000 to $14,750,000; battleship No. 46, from $15,000,000 to $17,000,000; submarine No. 119 to submarine No. 122, both inclusive, each from $1,750,000 to $1,990,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. What is the purpose of section 10 increasing these appropriations?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, this gives me a very great disappointment. This provision is reported here and is in the bill which I put my name to. These obligations have been incurred and the ships are about completed. The cost was increased without authority of Congress. I am not here to defend or shield anybody. It has been a habit for years to finish the ships when near completion although they run over the cost authorized by Congress. The California is entirely completed and the Maryland is the other one and is about completed and ready for commission.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman means to say that the department has expended these large sums of money for the construction of these vessels.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Without authority for the use of the extra sums.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman mean that for the completion of all the other battleships the committee is going to explain to us that the Navy Department has gone beyond the appropriations irrespective of the action of Congress and has created an indebtedness for which the committee will ask Congress to make further appropriations?

Mr. BUTLER. Now, if the gentleman will give me a chance to reply. They asked to increase the cost of these ships. I talked with the chairman of the subcommittee on appropriations for the Navy and I also talked with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], and our minds were the same, and I went back and reported to the Naval Affairs Committee that we would vote to accept an increase for two, but warned the officers that we were going slow on the program and would delay the other ships and would not vote to increase the cost on the other four. This has happened and the other has not happened. We have got them warned. They say that we may have it to do, but I do not intend to do it if I can avoid it. These ships have been built and the money has been spent. I am not apologizing for anyone and I am not making any defense for anyone.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to ask the gentleman another question; from the statement of the gentleman I take it that we have no assurance that the Naval Committee will not be asked to come before Congress for a further appropriation for each of the battleships not mentioned in this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. In reply to the gentleman's query I can only speak for myself. I have given them warning and I propose to ask the Secretary of the Navy to join with me in delaying the completion of these vessels, to build them within the figures named if we have to run until 1930.

Mr. DOWELL. Why will not the gentleman add such an amendment to this section of the bill to delay the construction of these vessels?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This is a House bill and the matter can not come before the House in the regular way except by a House bill or by Senate amendment. Does anybody doubt that the four ships will be in the bill when it comes back from the other House?

Mr. DOWELL. I think we can expect such action by the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentlemen in the committee will bear with me for a minute, give me their attention, I want to say that if I should be on the conference committee between the House and the Senate upon this bill or any other, and these other ships should be put in, the House will have a chance to vote on them.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman, as chairman of the committee, has brought before us and for our consideration the increase of the appropriations for two ships, but there are four others which he intimates may be brought in.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at this time, but two years later. It was told us that they would not have to have an extension now, and therefore I do not anticipate that it will come in this bill from the Senate. But I promise, gentlemen, that when it does come the House shall have an opportunity to vote on it if I am on the conference committee.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman offer an amendment that will preclude the Navy Department from continuing the construction of the other ships, thus making an additional appropriation unnecessary when the bill comes back from the Senate?

Mr. BUTLER. I would do it if I knew how.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to make a statement in justice to the present Secretary of the Navy. These matters were presented to the Congress in the last Congress in a bill which failed. Then in March, when the present Secretary came into office, he found the condition of these ships such that they were almost completed, and that if he stopped work there would be a very large and unjustifiable additional expense, which would accrue by reason of stopping the work. The ships were 98 and 99 per cent completed.

Mr. DOWELL. Does that excuse him from going beyond the appropriations?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. He has not gone beyond the appropriation, but he has gone beyond the authorized limit of cost. The question presented to the Secretary was whether it would be better to incur this additional expense by reason of stopping the work or to go ahead and complete the ships. After conferring over the matter he determined to go ahead with the expenditure, because that was the better policy to pursue. He has violated the law, there is no doubt about that, but the justification for it was that in doing so he pursued the wiser and less expensive policy.

Mr. WALSH. Was this increased cost caused by changes in design of the ships and adding new devices, new material that was not contemplated in the original plan?

Mr. PADGETT. These ships were built upon the cost-plus basis.

Mr. WALSH. Did the additional cost come from doing something new?

Mr. PADGETT. There were some changes made, as are made in all ships. Then there was the additional cost of labor and material which was not anticipated at first.

Mr. EVANS. If the ships were 98 and 99 per cent completed on the 4th of March, there must have been $2,000,000 increase since then.

Mr. PADGETT. This is to pay for work already done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, before that amendment is reported, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This bill is privileged under the rules by the special rule. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that we might rise now?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not the floor. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor?

Mr. TINCHER. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that gentlemen desire to discuss this section and that an important amendment will be offered in the way of an additional section, which will require some discussion. In view of that fact, may I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it might be well to rise at this time?

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be delighted to do that. I have only been waiting for somebody to give me the tip. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7864 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TAGUE, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. KNUTSON, for two weeks, on account of illness.

To Mr. LARSEN of Georgia, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

ADJOURNMENT OVER—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn until Monday next, and that to-morrow the only business in order shall be bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it shall adjourn until Monday next, and that to-morrow the only business in order shall be bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE COTTON CROP.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, for the past 10 months we have heard a good deal of argument in connection with the Federal Reserve Board in respect to the matter of deflation and the increasing of the rates of interest and various other things. Gentlemen from the South understand the serious conditions of the banks, of the cotton farmers, and, in fact, of every line of business in the South.

I have been very much interested in the matter in behalf of my people and have been trying for the last 30 days to bring about some plan whereby the Federal Reserve Board should make a statement to create confidence and whereby it would extend a further line of credit to help harvest the incoming cotton crop and put the same on the market.

On the 11th of this month I received from Mr. J. S. Wannamaker, president of the American Cotton Association, a letter urging me to take up the matter with Gov. Harding and the members of his board in the effort to secure authorization for the extension of, say, $100,000,000 additional credit on customers' notes secured by cotton warehouse receipts.

On the same day I wrote Gov. Harding to this effect, and on the following day I received from him a reply setting forth the attitude of the Federal reserve banks of the South to their member banks in connection with rediscounting their paper. He further stated that he had mailed a copy of my letter to five Federal reserve banks of the cotton section asking them to place the same before their boards and make public statements as to their policies.

In the meantime, being further impressed with the importance of the matter and the evident fact that there was general misunderstanding concerning it, Gov. Harding called a conference of the heads of these reserve banks to meet with his board in Washington on the 19th instant, and at that conference a full statement was issued by the meeting in accordance with my request.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of this body to have printed in the RECORD the letters I have mentioned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to print the letters referred to in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AMERICAN COTTON ASSOCIATION,
NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
St. Matthews, S. C., July 8, 1921.

Hon. HAMPTON P. FULMER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FULMER: As you of course know southern banks are so tied up with loans carried over from last fall and winter that they are unable to function in their usual way and to make loans for current business out of their present resources. Consequently business is shrinking from day to day and distress is becoming more and more acute.

There is no real market for spot cotton at present. Cotton can only be sold in a limited way at about one-third the cost of production. Sales now made are practically all distress sales—cotton that the farmers are forced to sell, regardless of price and market conditions. Confidence, undoubtedly, must be restored promptly to save the situation.

I have outlined the proposition contained herein to numbers of leading bankers, merchants, business men, and farmers, and each in turn expressed a firm belief that it would effectually accomplish the purpose desired; that it would restore confidence and would relieve the present distressing situation in the South and restore some measure of its normal business. It was unanimously agreed that the conditions are so distressing that immediate relief is of the utmost importance to prevent even a more distressing situation, and that the relief as outlined could be more promptly and effectually put into execution than any other proposition that has been advanced.

PROPOSED PLAN.

The simplest method of giving the required relief would be through the Federal reserve banks in the shape of rediscounts of paper secured by cotton, and I think, if possible, this privilege should be given to banks in the cotton States, whether they are members of the Federal reserve system or not, but it should be distinctly understood that these rediscounts are not to have any bearing upon the ordinary accommodation granted by such Federal reserve banks to member banks of the system, somewhat in line with rediscounts granted on Liberty loan bonds, which, you will remember, were not counted against the credit of the borrower or of the bank rediscounting during the time these bonds were being sold.

In my judgment—and I find, as outlined, that it meets the unanimous approval of the judgment of the leading bankers, merchants, business men, and farmers in various sections of the cotton belt—if it was announced that the Federal reserve banks were prepared to loan $100,000,000 to the banks of the cotton States, upon customers' paper secured by warehouse receipts for cotton properly insured at, say, 80 per cent of its market value, or upon cotton manufacturers' acceptances of drafts against shipments of cotton for consumption in their mills, then confidence, and with it business, would be restored to a very large extent. All such paper should run from 30 to 90 days and should be renewable during the year 1921, or until markets are opened and confidence is restored; these loans to be made on the basis of 80 per cent of the market value of cotton, which would offer a security equally as valuable as Liberty loan bonds.

If the Federal reserve could be induced to grant this accommodation, as outlined above, their offer to grant loans of $100,000,000 would at once restore confidence and establish a firm market upon a better basis than now exists. It would bring great benefits not alone to the farmers but to the bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and, in fact, to every line of business in the South, and be of great benefit to the business of the entire Nation.

I do not believe that 25 per cent of the amount offered would be taken, because it would be found unnecessary. I wish to emphasize again that it would have to be made clear that these loans would be special and would not be counted in the original accommodation granted by the Federal reserve banks to its member banks. Unless this was done it would prove of no benefit, as the southern banks are so tied up with loans carried over from last fall and winter that they are unable to function in their usual manner and to make loans for current business out of their present resources. Of course, if the loans were made by the Federal reserve banks of the southern territory, these banks would have to rediscount with the other Federal reserve banks, but the whole system is in excellent shape to do this at the present time. They could easily extend many times this amount of credits and still have a gold reserve far in excess of the legal requirement.

There is urgent necessity for this relief in the immediate future. I beg that you at once call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the governor of the Federal Reserve Board; and in addition to this, that you select a special committee and call upon the President and Secretary Hoover, and urge that they use their influence to have the relief, as outlined above, granted without delay.

This matter has received the marked attention of the leaders in agriculture and business of the various cotton-growing States, and I have assured them that we would immediately lay the matter before you, urging your concentrated efforts, and that you call into cooperation with you Congressmen and Senators, not only from the South but from other agricultural sections, for the purpose of securing this relief, and that we would immediately telegraph them the result of your efforts.

Please let us hear from you without delay, as the matter is very urgent, and oblige, with all good wishes,

Sincerely,

J. S. WANNAMAKER,
President American Cotton Association.

JULY 11, 1921.

Mr. J. S. WANNAMAKER,
St. Matthews, S. C.

MY DEAR MR. WANNAMAKER: Your mimeographed letter, dated July 9, outlining a plan for rediscounting paper secured by cotton, received to-day.

I have accordingly addressed a personal letter to Gov. Harding and each member of the Federal Reserve Board, Secretary Mellon, and Comptroller Crissinger, outlining your plan and requesting immediate action.

In the meantime I shall study and reflect upon the matter and cover it in any other way that seems proper.

Sincerely, yours,

H. P. FULMER, M. C.

JULY 11, 1921.

Hon. WM. P. G. HARDING,
Governor Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HARDING: I wish to call to your attention, for as earnest consideration and quick action as you may find possible, a plan just proposed by Mr. J. Skottowe Wannamaker, president of the American Cotton Association, for the relief of the present distressing situation in the South. It is this:

THE REDISCOUNTING OF PAPER SECURED BY COTTON.

Authorize the loan of $100,000,000 through the Federal reserve banks to the banks of the cotton States, upon customers' paper secured by warehouse receipts for cotton properly insured at, say, 80 per cent of its market value, or upon cotton manufacturers' acceptances of drafts against shipments of cotton for consumption in their mills, paper to run from 30 to 90 days, renewable during 1921, or until the markets are opened, the distinct understanding being that these discounts are not to have any bearing upon the ordinary accommodations by the Federal reserve banks to their member banks. Without this understanding the loans would prove of no benefit, as the southern banks are so tied up with loans carried over from last year that they are unable to function in their usual manner and make loans for current business out of their present resources.

Leading bankers, merchants, business men, and farmers have expressed the firm belief that this loan would accomplish the purpose of relieving conditions and restoring some measure of normal business. Business is now shrinking from day to day, and distress is becoming more acute. Confidence must be restored promptly.

I therefore ask that you take immediate cognizance of this proposition. As I see it, if assistance is not forthcoming at once conditions will become so acute that it will take years to overcome the disastrous effect. This matter has received the marked attention of leaders in business and agriculture, and I have assured them that I would immediately lay the matter before you and request your prompt and favorable action.

Very sincerely, yours,

H. P. FULMER, M. C.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, July 12, 1921.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FULMER: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, in which you suggest as a means of relieving the present distressing situation in the South the authorization of a loan of $100,000,000 through the Federal reserve banks to the banks of the cotton States, upon customers' paper secured by warehouse receipts for cotton properly insured at, say, 80 per cent of its market value, or upon cotton manufacturers' acceptances of drafts against shipments of cotton for consumption in their mills, the paper to run from 30 to 90 days, renewable during 1921, or until the markets are opened. You suggest, further, that there should be a distinct understanding that these discounts will not have any bearing upon the ordinary accommodations by the Federal reserve banks to their member banks, stating that without such an understanding the loans would prove of no benefit, as the southern banks are so tied up with loans carried over from last year that they are unable to function in their usual manner and make loans for current business out of their present resources.

In reply, I would advise you that such loans are already authorized, and all Federal reserve banks in the cotton sections are carrying paper of this character for their member banks and have been doing so for many months past. There is no question of the ability of the Federal reserve banks to rediscount paper to the amount named, or more if necessary, under the terms presented by the Federal reserve act. While the Federal reserve banks of Richmond and Dallas would be considerably below their required reserves to-day if put upon their own footing, they are maintaining them by rediscounting with other Federal reserve banks and will have no difficulty in rediscounting such additional amounts as may be needed. The Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta has for some time past maintained its required reserve without rediscounting with other Federal reserve banks, although it is quite likely that it will be rediscounting in a short while. The Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis has a stronger reserve than any of the other banks in the cotton sections and does not anticipate any difficulty in meeting all legitimate demands out of its own resources. The Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City also has a strong reserve, which stands but a few points below that of the St. Louis bank. The Federal Reserve Banks of Richmond, Atlanta, St. Louis, and Dallas all have a flat rate of 6 per cent. The only bank in the system which still maintains the progressive rate is the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, which has a normal rate of 6 per cent, an intermediate rate of 7 per cent, and a maximum rate of 8 per cent.

There seems to be a good deal of misapprehension and confusion as to the functions and powers of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks. Some people seem to be under the impression that we have a central bank in this country. This is not the case. The powers of the directors of the Federal reserve banks are defined in section 4 of the Federal reserve act, while those of the Federal Reserve Board are defined specifically in section 11. Section 13 gives the board the right to determine or define the character of paper eligible for rediscount within the meaning of the act and the limitations of that section. The directors of the Federal reserve banks are charged with the administration of their respective institutions. They have the sole power to pass upon eligible paper offered their respective banks for rediscount, and the board can not force them to take paper which may be, in their opinion, unsafe or undesirable. The lending power is in the hands of the banks and not of the board. Each Federal reserve bank is a body corporate and as such each bank, among other things, is authorized "to exercise by its board of directors or duly authorized officers or agents all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this act and such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking within the limitations prescribed by this act." "Every Federal reserve bank shall be conducted under the supervision and control of a board of directors. The board of directors shall perform the duties usually appertaining to the office of directors of banking associations and all such duties as are prescribed by law." Nowhere in the act is the Federal Reserve Board given power to pass on credits and the board maintains no credit files. The board itself is not organized as a banking institution, but merely as a supervisory body, having general supervision subject to the express reservations in section 4 of the Federal reserve act.

In your letter you touch upon one of the difficulties in the present situation. You say that "the southern banks are so tied up with loans carried over from last year that they are unable to function in their usual manner and make loans for current business out of their present resources." A considerable number of the member banks in the cotton districts are not rediscounting at all, and of those that are rediscounting more than one-half are rediscounting very heavily. Many member banks are carrying loans in larger volume, no doubt, than their own directors would like to have them carry, and I know of some member banks which are very reluctant to add to their contingent liability as indorser on any terms.

While the suggestion made in your letter raises a question of banking policy which should be determined by the Federal reserve banks themselves rather than the Federal Reserve Board, I may say that I do not believe any advantage would be gained in having an understanding that any new loans will not be counted as part of the bank's regular line. No loans can be made by any Federal reserve bank except with the indorsement of a member bank, and the indorsing bank's liability is there whether it is regarded as part of its regular line or not.

With the concurrence of other members of the board, I am sending copies of your letter to the governors of the Federal reserve banks of Richmond, Atlanta, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Dallas, with the request that it be brought to the attention of their respective boards of directors and suggesting that each bank, as promptly as possible, make a public announcement of its policy regarding cotton loans. It is the board's view, and the board has so advised the banks, that it is the duty of the directors of each Federal reserve bank to give consideration to all applications for rediscount of eligible paper and that the directors of each Federal reserve bank or its duly authorized officers must be the sole judges of the soundness and desirability of paper offered for rediscount.

The board feels assured that the Federal reserve banks are fully informed of the conditions in their respective districts and that they will adopt a broad and liberal policy in assisting their member banks to meet the requirements of the situation.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
House of Representatives.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD.
STATEMENT FOR THE PRESS.

[For release in morning papers Wednesday, July 20, 1921.]

In view of the vital importance of the problem incident to the harvesting and marketing of the coming cotton crop, the Federal Reserve Board to-day held a conference with the governors of the Federal reserve banks of Richmond, Atlanta, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Dallas, the banks located in or brought in closest touch with the member banks in the cotton States, for the purpose of reviewing the credit situation in these States and determining what further credit will be needed to facilitate the harvesting and orderly marketing of this crop.

At the present time the five reserve banks in question are lending to their members $457,000,000, or more than 26 per cent of the loans of the entire system, the Richmond bank borrowing from other reserve banks $20,000,000 and the Dallas bank borrowing $16,000,000 for that purpose. The total loans of these five reserve banks to their member banks exceed their reserve deposits by $192,000,000, whereas the reserve deposits of the other seven reserve banks exceed their loans to their members by $118,000,000.

The amount now loaned by these reserve banks to their members is four and one-half times the amount borrowed at any one time by all the national banks of the country prior to 1914, or before the establishment of the Federal reserve system.

The Federal Reserve Board and the governors of the Federal reserve banks announce that the Federal reserve banks, in addition to credits already extended, are able and stand ready to extend further credit for the purpose of harvesting and marketing the coming crop, in whatever amount may legitimately be required, either directly to their member banks, or, under a ruling now issued by the Federal Reserve Board, indirectly to nonmember banks acting through the agency and with the indorsement of a member bank. These loans will be made by the Federal reserve banks upon notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn in accordance with the terms of the Federal reserve act and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board for the harvesting or orderly marketing of the coming cotton crop.

In order, however, that these rediscount facilities of the Federal reserve banks may be made fully effective it will be necessary that member banks in the cotton States place their loaning facilities freely at the disposal of cotton producers and dealers in their respective localities with the knowledge and assurance that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks recognize the urgency of rendering all proper assistance to these important interests during such abnormal times.

Mr. Meyer, managing director of the War Finance Corporation, who attended the conference, reviewed the activities of the War Finance Corporation in making loans for financing cotton for immediate and future export. Gov. Strong, of the Federal reserve bank of New York, and representatives of certain New York member banks were also invited to the conference to discuss the necessity or advisability of having various commercial banks through the country establish a fund for the purpose of making loans upon cotton. In view of the conclusions reached by the conference as to the ability of the Federal reserve banks effectively to take care of all of the legitimate requirements of the cotton interests, it was felt that the establishment of such a fund at this time is neither necessary nor advisable. Gov. Strong stated, however, that he had received assurances from a number of important banking institutions in New York City that if the facilities now offered by the Federal reserve banks and the War Finance Corporation should prove to be inadequate, they will cooperate in the establishment of a cotton loan fund in whatever amount the situation might demand.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1921.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, the statement has gone out that in the Southern States we are suffering from famine and possibly a pellagra epidemic. Of course, that would include Florida. I would like to have the Clerk read in my time a telegram in reference to this matter, as I am positive no one desires, intentionally, to injure my State.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the telegram.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. W. J. SEARS,

Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Have referred your telegram to State board of health. You know, of course, that there is neither pestilence nor famine in Florida, nor any semblance of such.

MARION L. DAWSON,
Secretary to the Governor.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, my State has had the pleasure of entertaining the Speaker, and recently the President visited my State. On several occasions I have opposed increases in freight rates and placing taxes on freight rates, as many of my colleagues will no doubt recall. As a matter of fact, we have large quantities of vegetables and fruit every year we could ship if the rates were not prohibitory. There is plenty to eat in Florida, no epidemic, and the weather there is very, very much cooler than it is in Washington at the present time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Public Health Service recently issued a bulletin, or statement, indicating the existence and large increase of an alarming epidemic of pellagra in the Southern States, attributing the alleged increase of this distressing malady to the insufficient and improper nourishment of the people resulting from their inability to purchase food on account of the heavy decline in the price of cotton. A semi-famine is reported to exist in the cotton belt.

It is true the drop in the price of cotton almost overnight from 45 to around 10 cents per pound was calculated to cause untold distress, panic, and suffering and has, and is, causing great numbers of people in the cotton belt to suffer severe hardships and privations, and conditions are distressing. The cotton industry has been temporarily destroyed as a result of the low price, the ravages of the boll weevil, and the great expense incident to production.

However, this report of the Bureau of Public Health Service, which has touched the great, sympathetic heart of the President and caused him to address letters to the Surgeon General and the head of the Red Cross asking for an immediate survey and report of the situation in order that proper relief steps may be taken and has also caused such great publicity in the press of the country, would seem to be exaggerated and misleading.

The report estimates 100,000 cases of the disease and that 10,000 deaths will result.

Georgia is not singled out in the statement, but as she is included I am unwilling for the statement, so far as she is concerned, to go unchallenged. That there are some cases of pellagra in Georgia and the South can not be denied, but what are the facts? After the report in question became public I inquired of the Pellagra Division of the Bureau of Public Health Service for facts and statistics as to Georgia and found they had none and that detailed statistics from Georgia are not received by the bureau. Think of it! It can not be ascertained from the bureau the number of cases of pellagra in Georgia, the number of deaths resulting from it, the real conditions or whether the disease is on the increase. And yet the startling report is given publicity that there are in the South, of which Georgia is an important part, some hundred thousand cases of pellagra.

Failing to get any information from the bureau as to the present pellagra conditions in Georgia, I wired the very capable and efficient secretary or commissioner of the State board of public health of Georgia and received a prompt reply, by wire, as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., July 27, 1921.

W. C. WRIGHT,

Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Deaths from pellagra first six months 1920 totaled 193 deaths. First six months 1921 totaled 196, an increase of 3 over corresponding period of last year. Telegrams received this morning from all sections of Georgia not only show there is no increase but in many instances health officials who are in position to know state there is a decrease both in cases reported and deaths.

ABERCROMBIE, Commissioner of Health.

It must be kept in mind in the first six months of 1920 cotton brought as high as 45 cents per pound, and in the first six months of 1921 the prevailing price was around 10 to 12 cents per pound, and yet the alleged increase in the number of cases of pellagra in 1921 is traced to the low price of cotton.

I have conferred with Representatives from most of the Southern States and learn from them as well as from other sources that no report of an increase of pellagra can be verified, and I have no doubt the situation in practically all of the Southern States is what it is in Georgia.

Now, getting back to the famine report, so far as it was intended to relate to my State, candor and truth require me to say the people of Georgia are facing an awful crisis brought about by the aftermath of the World War and the blighting effects of the unprecedented slump in the price of cotton and the great damage which has and is being wrought by the boll weevil, but this is not the first crisis through which my people have passed, and with that same dauntless courage and indomitable energy and pluck which have characterized them in the past they are facing this one, and, thanks to a beneficent Creator, the grim and gaunt specter of famine and hunger is not stalking abroad in the Empire State of the South, and my people are not asking alms, but simply demand just and wholesome laws under which to live and a fair market for the fruits of their toils.

They have learned by bitter experience to diversify their crops, and how is a famine possible in a State of practically 3,000,000 people with about 1,200,000 head of cattle, over 2,000,000 head of hogs, and with an annual and increasing production of over 1,000,000 bushels of wheat, about fifty-one and one-half million bushels of corn, over 10,000,000 bushels of sweet potatoes, about 4,000,000 bushels of peanuts, more than half a million bushels of dry peas, about 9,000,000 gallons of sirup, over 23,000,000 dozens of chicken eggs, about 15,000,000 chickens, nearly a million turkeys, ducks, geese, guineas, and pigeons, besides immense quantities of rich and wholesome dairy products, great varieties of vegetables and fruits, as well as immense quantities of other foodstuffs? Georgia has reaped $10,000,000 from the sale of melons and peaches alone the present season. Add to what I have said the many millions she receives from her natural resources, such as timber, granite, marble, iron, coal, and other minerals, and the vast amount received from her varied manufactured products.

Reference is made in the bureau bulletin to the tenant class in the South. As a matter of fact, our merchants, farmers, bankers, and all classes are cooperating, and the landowners are furnishing, where necessary, the laborers, croppers, and tenants, both white and black, with supplies and the necessities of life, and in many instances without any assurance that the products produced will repay one-half the outlay.

Most of the textile mills and other manufacturing plants will accept orders for the actual cost of their products in order to furnish employment to their operatives so that they may earn enough to supply the needs of life.

I can not close without giving assurance of the profound appreciation of my people to the President for his anxious solicitude and deep interest in the matter under discussion, but we are at a loss to know from what source and in what manner the alleged information which so arouses and touches him could have been gathered by the Bureau of Public Health Service and why the seeming suddenness with which this bureau gathered and gave publicity to this so-called information.

I repeat, what my people crave is constructive, wholesome laws and a fair chance and opportunity, and under the guidance of an All-Wise Being they will work out their own salvation; cotton will once more be enthroned as king, and the fair Southland will again come into her own, blossom as the rose, and her people will be contented and happy.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a newspaper article in reference to the service rendered in the recent war by Indian soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing in the Record the newspaper article to which he referred. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting my observations on the recent bombing tests off Virginia coast.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 29, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

198. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Comptroller General, transmitting a tentative draft of legislation regarding the settlement of claims by the accounting officers of the United States, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2208. By Mr. TEMPLE: Evidence in support of House bill 7702, special bill in behalf of Mrs. Sarah A. Herrick, widow of Henry A. Herrick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

2209. By Mr. WOODYARD: Petition of citizens of West Virginia, favoring the elimination of the tax on carbonated beverages dispensed at soda fountains; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 29, 1921.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, July 27, 1921.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield for a moment?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McLean	Stanfield
Ball	Hale	McNary	Stanley
Brandeggee	Harrell	Moses	Sterling
Broussard	Harris	Nelson	Sutherland
Bursum	Harrison	Nicholson	Swanson
Calder	Heflin	Norbeck	Townsend
Cameron	Johnson	Oddie	Trammell
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Underwood
Caraway	Kellogg	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	Kenyon	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Keyes	Ransdell	Warren
Dial	Ladd	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Edge	La Follette	Shortridge	Watson, Ind.
Ernst	Lenroot	Simmons	Williams
Fernald	McCormick	Smith	Willis
Fletcher	McCumber	Smoot
Gerry	McKellar	Spencer

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] are engaged in hearings before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. DIAL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. DIAL. Will the Senator yield to me for just a short statement?

Mr. GOODING. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

HEALTH AND FOOD CONDITIONS IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, one day last week, I think on the 18th, I read in the Washington Herald an article from the Public Health Service stating that there might be a great deal of pellagra in the South, particularly in the Southwest, according to my recollection, and that there might be some famine this winter. It stated there would probably be 100,000 cases and 10,000 deaths. I was very much surprised at the statement. I had heard of no cases of pellagra in my State in a good while, and I certainly did not think and do not now think there will be any famine this winter. At any rate, I wrote to Surg. Gen. Hugh S. Cumming, of the Public Health Service, a letter a copy of which I desire to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will not the Senator have it read?

Mr. DIAL. I ask that the letter may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., July 18, 1921.

SURG. GEN. HUGH S. CUMMING,
Public Health Service, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GEN. CUMMING: It has just come to my attention that because of the cotton situation in the South, due to the low price of the staple, with the consequent underfeeding of many of the smaller farm tenants, there is likely to be much suffering and disease caused by pellagra in that section in the near future. This information reached me in newspaper accounts which quote your department. If these statements are correct, may I not call your immediate attention to the great necessity that exists for not only informing the people of what may happen, but also for taking such steps as may be necessary to prevent and combat such a situation as would arise should this disease again take hold in the South?

I was under the impression that with the stamping out of pellagra a few years ago, the hospital at Spartanburg, S. C., had been discontinued, or was only performing part of its former work. However this may be, I desire to call your attention to the great necessity of taking such steps now by continuing the work at Spartanburg as may appear proper to prevent a repetition of this disease in that locality.

Yours, very truly,

N. B. DIAL.

It has been stated in the press in my home State that I wrote to or communicated with the President of the United States and caused great alarm with reference to the situation. As a matter of fact, I did not communicate with the President directly or indirectly. The letter which has just been read at the desk is the only communication I had with anyone on the subject. My object was merely to have the Public Health Service take whatever steps it could to prevent a recurrence of pellagra and to investigate and if possible discover the cause and a remedy.

At the time I first came to the Senate there was a hospital in existence at Spartanburg, S. C., for the treatment of this disease. It was at that time the only hospital in the United States for that purpose. During the first session after I became a Member of the Senate for some reason the appropriation for that hospital was withdrawn by the committee. I made a fight on the floor of the Senate, as the result of which the appropriation was restored, and the hospital was continued for a year or two.

At the last session of the Congress, or perhaps during the early days of the present session, no item was contained in the appropriation bill for this hospital for the purpose of continuing that work. I inquired into the matter at the time, and was informed by the Public Health Service that it was not necessary to longer continue the hospital; that they had the disease under control; and that it had been practically eradicated. That was entirely satisfactory to me. They further stated that there was a general appropriation, and if it became necessary to reestablish the hospital it could be done through that appropriation. Therefore I asked for no further special appropriation.

Now, Mr. President, these are the facts in the case. I have no wish to magnify the situation, but there are some cases of pellagra in my State and some in other States, and in justice to the Public Health Service I think it ought to be stated that on yesterday the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] presented some data with reference to the situation. Among other things, he said that in his State in June of last year there were 1,022 cases and in June of this year there were 2,239 cases. I am not an alarmist and I do not wish to magnify the matter at all. I am in hopes there will be no spread of the disease, and I certainly do not think there is any justification for the statement that there will be any famine in the South, or any likelihood of any famine, particularly in my State.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he is not aware of the fact that pellagra is not confined necessarily to people who are on a starvation basis, who do not have sufficient food, or who are poor?

Mr. DIAL. The Senator is entirely correct. I happen to know of my own knowledge of a lady—I will not state where she lived—who died a year or two ago of pellagra, whose means were abundant. She had plenty of this world's goods.

I am a little bit surprised at the Public Health Service discontinuing the investigation of this disease until they have ascertained the cause of it. I think it would be well to reestablish at least one hospital in the United States for that purpose.

I wrote the letter which has just been read, stating that it would be a good thing to pursue the investigation at Spartanburg, S. C. We employ hundreds and thousands of men in the War Department to discover and make poisonous gases to kill people, and when we spend so much money for that purpose it does seem to me we should spend something to prevent a recurrence of pellagra or any other disease that may threaten our citizens.

So far as the South is concerned, I think there is no danger of any famine whatever. God has blessed us with the best climate in the world, with a magnificent rainfall, with a splendid soil, and with the best people on top of the earth, but under the system that is now placed upon us by the unjust cotton-future contract law and by unjust railroad rates we are suffering and suffering greatly financially. I did not intend to mention the matter of the process of selling cotton to-day in connection with the pellagra situation, but I hope next week to present a full and complete statement to the Senate when that subject will be pertinent, showing how we are robbed of a great proportion of the value of each year's crop. This thievery is carried on under the law and by protection of Congress.

I feel that some of the newspapers of the country have, of course unintentionally, done me an injustice in this matter, but I am confident they will correct that erroneous impression when they shall learn the facts as I have stated them on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] has the floor, and he yielded to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I can not yield any further. I have already yielded too long.

Mr. DIAL. There is just a brief announcement that I wish to make.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I decline to yield any further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho declines to yield further.

THE WOOL AND WOOLEN SCHEDULE IN THE TARIFF.

Mr. GOODING resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on yesterday, which is entire, as follows:

Thursday, July 28, 1921.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, when the emergency tariff bill was passed I was hopeful that the Republican Party had come to a sense of realization of the importance of the agricultural and live-stock industries of the country.

I felt sure that in the new tariff bill the great live-stock industry would be given fair consideration, but after a hard fight to secure a square deal I find upon examination of the Fordney bill that it is the most dangerous measure ever passed by any party in the House of Representatives toward the live-stock industry, and if it is enacted into law without amendments some branches of the industry will be destroyed.

It is my purpose to show in my remarks that through the skirting clause that was passed in the act of 1890, which permitted wools to be shipped into this country in the grease, regardless of what part of the fleece had been removed or what effort had been made to reduce its shrinkage, a great industry has been impaired; that the Government has lost hundreds of millions of dollars in revenue, and that the American people have been robbed at the same time. I shall show further that what Schedule K did in an indirect way for the manufacturers the Fordney bill with its 35 per cent ad valorem duty on wool does in a direct way.

I am sorry to say that the Republican Party have not been friendly to the live-stock industry for a number of years. They have not given any branch of the industry proper protection. For years they have kept hides on the free list. During the consideration of the Fordney bill in the House of Representatives an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent was placed on hides, but on the final passage of the bill hides were again put on the free list.

The Democratic Party have never been friendly to the live-stock industry. Whenever they have taken over the reins of Government they have always taken an ax to the industry, and they have been mighty effectual at times in crippling it. But let it be said that the Democratic Party has always been fair. They have always advocated free wool, free hides, free meats, and free raw materials. They have never given any promises to the live-stock industry, and the industry has always got just what they expected when the Democratic Party was in power—and that was the ax.

I have not examined the Fordney bill, outside of the wool schedule, and so will confine my remarks to the duty that it gives to the woolgrowers and the wool manufacturers.

The wool schedule is not called Schedule K in the Fordney bill, yet I am sure it is worthy of the name.

It was President Taft who said Schedule K was indefensible, and there is no doubt about the truth of that statement, for if any man ever tried to defend Schedule K on the stump I never heard of it. But Schedule K, Mr. President, with all of its unfairness to the American people and to the great live-stock industry, was very commendable compared with the schedule on wool and woollens in the Fordney bill.

It has been said that the wool schedule in our tariff bills is the hardest of all schedules to understand, and I am sure that is true; otherwise the great mistakes of the past would never have been made; but the Republican Party can not go on making such mistakes as Schedule K without meeting other and more serious defeats.

As a Republican, I should like to forget Schedule K, for Schedule K has been more responsible for the defeat of the Republican Party than all the other mistakes that the party has ever made.

Serious as the defeat of the Republican Party is at any time, the most unfortunate thing of all is the fact that the Republican Party has not half defended the great principle of protection since the mistakes of Schedule K were exposed, which, in my judgment, is a serious omission and endangers the great principle of protection, for it is through the great principle of protection to American labor and American institutions that we have become the mightiest Nation on earth. Through that principle we have built up a standard of citizenship and a standard of living that is the best in all the world; but that standard can not be maintained without protection, and if the great principle of protection is going to be preserved in America we must have tariff laws that we can defend.

I believe we need protection in America to-day more than ever before, for we are facing a new world, with new conditions, and I am sure that competition for the trade of the world in the future is going to be sharp, keen, and severe, and if we are going to protect our own markets against the cheap products of foreign countries we must pass a tariff law that will protect, and one that the enemies of protection can not break down and destroy.

In discussing Schedule K and the wool schedule in the Fordney bill there is not the slightest intention on my part to cast any reflections on those who have had anything to do with framing our wool schedules. My memory carries me back to the time when I attended live-stock conventions in the West, and believed in Schedule K. Resolutions were passed with a great deal of enthusiasm, indorsing Schedule K, and its 11 cents duty on a pound of grease wool.

As I look back upon those days, I remember that the manufacturer was always there. He was one of the boys; he always had something nice to say; spoke softly; was well dressed, and I am sure was well fed. Later I saw the manufacturer and Schedule K in their true light, and therefore I can realize how mistakes can be made in schedules that are so hard to understand as the wool schedules in our tariff laws. So if I shall call a law a menace to good citizenship that permits one industry to rob another it is not with the slightest thought of casting any reflections upon anyone who has had anything to do with these technical schedules.

Mr. President, first let me say that I am no longer a live-stock grower. It is true that I have a few hundred head; but, as we measure the live-stock growers in the West, it can be said that I am out of the business. Nor am I making an appeal for the live-stock grower, whether he is large or small. I am only asking for a square deal for an industry upon which the life of this Nation depends, for live stock is nature's remedy for keeping up the fertility of the soil. Destroy your live stock, and in a few short years the soil will become exhausted and we will have a struggle in America to produce enough to feed our own people. Show me a community where the soil has been exhausted and where there has been a struggle for years to keep the wolf from the door, and I will show you a community where the citizenship, like the soil, has gone backward.

I am not worrying about the live-stock grower, for he is of little concern as compared with the industry. No relief can come in time to help a vast number of live-stock growers, for millions of live stock to-day are in the hands of the banks and mortgage companies, the grower only acting as an agent, hoping, against hope, that some day he may again be master of his own flocks and his own herds. The majority of them would be happy if they could be relieved of the obligations and of the responsibilities of fighting what seems to be almost a hopeless fight.

Nor am I making an appeal for a great industry alone, Mr. President. I am making an appeal for a law that can be defended. I am making an appeal for a law that will not permit one industry to rob another and at the same time rob the American people.

I shall have no trouble in showing how the manufacturers, through the manipulation of Schedule K, destroyed the protection to the woolgrowers; nor shall I have any trouble in showing that the manufacturers will not be forced to look for skirted wools any longer if the Fordney bill passes without amendment, for the law will do the job for him, and it will do it well.

My hope is, if the Senators will bear with me while I review the wool schedules in our tariff laws, beginning with the act of 1867, and make a comparison of our different tariff acts, including the Fordney bill, that I may be able to shed some light upon these technical schedules that are so hard to understand. Senators will have to exercise patience if they listen long to what I intend to say concerning these schedules, but I feel that it is necessary for us to have a better understanding of the wool schedule than we have had in the past. I have but one thought in this matter, Mr. President, and that is to help bring about a better understanding of these schedules.

It must be remembered that all of our tariff laws in the past have been based on foreign valuation, while the Fordney bill is based on American valuation.

In all of our tariff laws, with the exception of the act of 1883, which gave the manufacturers a compensatory duty on the basis that it required  $3\frac{1}{2}$  pounds of wool in the grease to make a pound of cloth, the manufacturers' duty on a pound of cloth has been figured on the basis that it took 4 pounds of wool in the grease, shrinking  $66\frac{2}{3}$  per cent, to make a pound of cloth, and his compensatory duty has always been four times the duty on a pound of grease wool. It has never been more than that until the passage of the Fordney bill, in which we find that the manufacturers have been given a compensatory duty on the basis that it takes  $4\frac{1}{2}$  pounds of grease wool, shrinking  $66\frac{2}{3}$  per cent, to make a pound of cloth.

The act of 1867 placed a duty on wool of the first class, valued at 32 cents a pound or less, foreign valuation, of 10 cents a pound and in addition 11 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 32 cents a pound, 12 cents a pound and in addition 10 per cent ad valorem.

On wools of the second class, valued at 32 cents a pound or less, foreign valuation, there was placed a duty of 10 cents a pound, and in addition 11 per cent ad valorem; on wools valued over 32 cents a pound, a duty of 12 cents a pound, and in addition 10 per cent ad valorem.

The protection given in the tariff act of 1867 to the manufacturers on woolen cloth, woolen shawls, and all manufactures of wool of every description made wholly or in part of wool not otherwise provided for was 50 cents per pound compensatory duty and in addition 35 per cent ad valorem.

On flannels, blankets, and all manufactures of every description, composed wholly or in part of worsted, valued at not exceeding 40 cents per pound, a compensatory duty of 20 cents a pound was given; valued at above 40 cents a pound, and not exceeding 60 cents a pound, a compensatory duty of 30 cents a pound was given; valued at above 60 cents, and not exceeding 80 cents a pound, a compensatory duty of 50 cents was allowed; and in addition, on all the above, 35 per cent ad valorem.

I want especially to call the attention of Senators to the compensatory duty on the higher priced cloths, flannels, and blankets in the act of 1867. That act gives 50 cents a pound on all of the high-grade materials valued at more than 80 cents a pound, and in addition 35 per cent ad valorem. This compensatory duty of 50 cents a pound on the higher-priced goods in the act of 1867 is the duty on 4 pounds of wool in the grease and is proof that those who framed that tariff law framed it on the basis that it required 4 pounds of grease wool to make a pound of these higher-priced materials.

The act of 1872 made a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent on all classes of wool and woolens, but the act of 1875 repealed that horizontal reduction and left the duty on wool and woolens the same as in the act of 1867.

It is in the act of 1883 that Schedule K appears for the first time in our tariff laws. The act of 1883 reduced the protection on wool and woolens, but followed along the same general lines as the act of 1867. It placed a duty on first and second class wools when valued at less than 30 cents a pound, foreign valuation, of 10 cents per pound, and when valued at more than 30 cents a pound, foreign valuation, of 12 cents per pound, but did not give wool any additional compensatory duty.

The act of 1883 is the most scientific and fairest protective tariff law, so far as the schedules on woolens are concerned, ever passed by the Republican Party. The framers of that act understood that the manufacturers were importing wool at that time that did not shrink  $66\frac{2}{3}$  per cent, and for that reason they fixed the compensatory duty on woolen goods whose valuation indicated that they were made of wool at 35 cents a pound.

The same act on woolen cloths, woolen shawls, and all manufactures of wool not specially enumerated or provided for in the act, valued at not exceeding 80 cents per pound, placed a compensatory duty of 35 cents per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem. Valued at above 80 cents per pound, a compensatory duty of 35 cents a pound and 40 per cent ad valorem.

It is the compensatory duty on the cheap fabrics in this schedule in the act of 1883 that I want to call the Senate's attention to. On flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods, and all other goods made on knitting frames, balmorals, woolen and worsted yarns, and all manufactures of every description composed wholly or in part of worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other animals—except such as are composed in part of wool—not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, valued at not exceeding 30 cents per pound, there is 10 cents per pound compensatory duty; valued at above 30 cents per pound and not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound compensatory duty; valued at above 40 cents per pound and not exceeding 60 cents per pound, 18 cents per pound compensatory duty; valued at above 60 cents per pound and not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 24 cents per pound compensatory duty; and upon all the above-named articles, 35 per cent ad valorem; valued at above 80 cents per pound, 35 cents per pound compensatory duty and 40 per cent ad valorem.

The question can very properly be asked, What kind of material is there in any fabric that is worth less than 30 cents a pound?

On page 84, the report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K has this to say about cheap shoddy:

Mungo is a low-grade shoddy made from hard-spun felted and fullered cloths, as distinguished from shoddy, which is made from loosely woven or knitted fabrics. This distinction, however, is generally disregarded in the American trade, and mungos are classed as low-grade shoddies. Flocks are the short fiber or nap shorn from the surface of woven fabrics in the finishing room. It is so short and fine that it gives the impression of pulverized wool. After the nap on the cloth has been raised by gigning, it must be leveled and finished off by shearing. The shearing machine acts like a lawn mower in cutting the raised nap, and the short wool clipped off by it is known as flocks. Flocks are sometimes made by grinding woolen rags up into a powdered state. They are used in the fulling process to give body and weight to cheap fabrics and also for lining rubber coats and like articles.

Production of mungo and flocks: Such mungo as is produced in the United States is included with shoddy. In fact, shoddy, mungo, and wool extract are all designated in the trade as shoddy. In 1904 the flocks produced in the United States amounted to 697,295 pounds, valued at $24,862. This shows the average value of flocks per pound to be a little over 3 cents.

Mr. President, I wish to include in my remarks and have printed in the RECORD a table taken from the report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K, showing the price quotations on old woolen rags and new tailor clips in the United States for the years 1904 to 1911, inclusive. The table will be found at the bottom of page 80, in part 1 of volume 1 of the report just mentioned:

NOTE.—The average price for the years mentioned is 8.6 cents per pound.

In the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee on the truth in fabric bill a witness stated that tailor clippings were a drug on the market at this time at from 5 to 6 cents a pound.

The statement was also made by another witness that the rag warehouses in New York were so jammed with old rags that the last cargo from Belgium, most of which were parts of soldiers' uniforms gathered up on the battle fields of Belgium, had to be put on barges and sent to Troy for storage.

My information is that the price of rags in America to-day is below the average price for the years mentioned of 8.6 cents per pound.

These prices of old rags gives one a very clear idea of the value of this cheap material, and it is not hard to understand how those who framed the act of 1883 arrived at their compensatory duties on the different grades of these cheap fabrics, for, very properly, they figured as the price increased in value that some wool was used in these materials; and when the value of the cloth reached above 80 cents a pound, which would indicate that it might be made of all wool, a compensatory duty of 35 cents a pound was given. The thoroughness with which this schedule was prepared is evidence of the careful thought and consideration the framers of the act of 1883 gave to the woollen schedule. It not only gave the manufacturers their full amount of compensatory duty but it protected the American people at the same time by not placing a duty on these cheap fabrics that acted as an embargo in our later tariff laws.

It was in the act of 1890 that the skirting clause was enacted that later made Schedule K famous. I will review the duties it gave on wool and woollens, and then make a comparison with the act of 1883.

The act of 1890 gave a duty on wool of the first class in the grease of 11 cents a pound, washed wool 22 cents a pound, and scoured wool 33 cents a pound; wool of the second class 12 cents a pound in the grease, 24 cents washed, and 48 cents a pound scoured.

This act continued the manufacturers' compensatory duty on the same basis as the act of 1867, that it required 4 pounds of unwashed wool of the first class to make a pound of cloth, and fixed the manufacturers' compensatory duty on all high-priced woollen goods at four times the duty on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class, or 44 cents a pound.

The duties on manufactures of wool in the tariff act of 1890 are as follows:

On woollen or worsted cloths, shawls, knit fabrics, and all fabrics made on knitting machines or frames, and all manufactures of every description made wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals not specially provided for in this act, valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three times the duty imposed by this act on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 30 and not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three and one-half times the duty imposed by this act on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem; valued at above 40 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be four times the duty imposed by this act on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 50 per cent ad valorem.

On blankets, hats of wool, and flannels for underwear composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be the same as the duty imposed by this act on 1½ pounds of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 30 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 30 and not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be twice the duty imposed by this act on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class; valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 50 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three times the duty imposed by this act on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto, upon all of the above-named articles, 35 per cent ad valorem.

On blankets and hats of wool composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals, valued at more than 50 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three and one-half times the duty imposed by this act on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto, 40 per cent ad valorem.

The duty that I have referred to in all cases is the compensatory duty given to the manufacturer to recompense him for the increased price that he is supposed to pay for his raw material because of the duty on wool.

The act of 1890 shows a radical increase in both compensatory and ad valorem duties over the act of 1883, and a comparison of the two acts is very illuminating.

In the act of 1890 the compensatory duty was increased over the act of 1883 from 35 cents on a pound of cloth and knit fabrics of the higher class to 44 cents, and the ad valorem duty from 40 per cent to 50 and 55 per cent.

The act of 1883 placed a compensatory duty on a pound of cloth and knit fabrics valued above 80 cents a pound of 35 cents and an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent; the act of 1890 placed a compensatory duty on all cloth and knit fabrics valued at above 40 cents a pound of 44 cents a pound and an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent.

The act of 1883 placed a compensatory duty of 10 cents a pound on cheaper fabrics, valued at 30 cents a pound or less, and an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent; the act of 1890 placed a compensatory duty of 33 cents a pound on these same materials, or an increase of 233 per cent over the act of 1883, and 40 per cent ad valorem.

The act of 1883 placed a compensatory duty of 12 cents a pound on cheaper fabrics, valued at 30 cents and not more than 40 cents a pound, and an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent; the act of 1890 placed a compensatory duty of 38½ per cent on these same materials, or an increase of over 200 per cent over the act of 1883, and 40 per cent ad valorem.

The act of 1883 placed a compensatory duty of 18 cents a pound on a pound of cloth valued at 40 cents a pound, and not more than 60 cents a pound, and an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent; the act of 1890 placed a compensatory duty of 44 cents a pound on these same materials, or an increase of 144 per cent over the act of 1883.

I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the compensatory duties in the act of 1890 on these cheap materials in most cases were more than the material was worth, and acted as an embargo all the time.

The act of 1897 placed the same duties on wool as the act of 1890, but made the following increases in the compensatory and ad valorem duties over the act of 1890 in some of its schedules: Cheaper blankets are increased from 16½ cents a pound compensatory duty in the act of 1890 to 22 cents a pound. On the next grade of blankets the compensatory duty is increased from 22 cents to 33 cents.

On the higher priced cloth and fabrics there is an increase in the ad valorem duties from 40 per cent in the act of 1890 to 50 per cent in the act of 1897, and from 50 per cent ad valorem on the higher class of goods in the act of 1890 to 55 per cent in the act of 1897.

The act of 1909 is an exact duplication of the act of 1897. It was at this time that President Taft said that Schedule K was indefensible. So the act of 1897 was accepted without any increased duties to the manufacturers. The wool duty remained the same, and the prices upon which the manufacturers' compensatory duty was given was four times the duty on a pound of grease wool of the first class, or 44 cents on a pound of cloth.

The point I want to make clear to the Senators is that through all of our tariff acts the woolgrowers have been given a duty of 11 cents on a pound of grease wool of the first class and a duty of 12 cents a pound on grease wool of the second class, double that amount of duty on a pound of washed wool, and three times the amount of the duty on a pound of grease wool for a pound of scoured wool.

Through all of our tariff acts, with the exception of the act of 1883, the manufacturers' compensatory duty on a pound of cloth has been four times the duty on a pound of grease wool of the first class.

If there is a question of doubt left in the mind of any Senator that all our compensatory duties on woolen goods were not based on the theory that it required 4 pounds of unwashed wool to make a pound of cloth, I would refer him to volume 20, page 141, of the bulletin for the year 1890 of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, edited by S. N. Dexter North, secretary, 70 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass. I will read from this volume what the manufacturers themselves have to say about compensatory duties:

In arriving at a true basis for calculating this compensatory duty the committee adopted the formula which has been accepted without challenge since the act of 1867, viz: That it requires  $3\frac{1}{2}$  pounds of unwashed wool to manufacture 1 pound of high-grade yarn and 4 pounds of unwashed wool to manufacture 1 pound of cloth, when proper allowance is made in each case for the loss in waste and shrinkage which occurs during the process of manufacture.

So we have manufacturers perfectly satisfied with 4 pounds of unwashed wool of the first class for a pound of cloth.

For the first time in the history of this country the Fordney bill gives the manufacturers  $4\frac{1}{2}$  pounds of wool, shrinking 66 $\frac{2}{3}$  per cent, to make a pound of cloth. They set aside all the tariff acts of the past, together with the manufacturers' own statement that 4 pounds of unwashed wool, shrinking 66 $\frac{2}{3}$  per cent, are sufficient to make a pound of cloth.

The manufacturers' true compensatory duty on a pound of scoured wool, paying a duty of 25 cents a pound, should be 33 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound, but the bill gives him 36 cents.

The story of how the American woolen manufacturer manipulated Schedule K to evade paying the full amount of the duties on wool, for which he received a compensatory duty of 44 cents a pound, may be interesting to those who are not familiar with the story.

The first act, of course, was to amend Schedule K so as to permit wools that had been skirted to be imported, and pay the single duty of 11 cents a pound. With that accomplished in the act of 1890 the task was not a difficult one.

The skirted fleece means that a little wool around the head of the sheep is first shorn; then a little more is shorn off the front legs; then all the belly is shorn; then the dirty tag locks are removed; and then a little is shorn off the hind legs.

It is on these parts of the sheep the staple is the shortest and the wool is the dirtiest. These clippings are pushed aside in a pile to themselves, and then the body of the sheep is shorn. In some of the shearing plants the fleece is gathered up and spread over a coarse wire sieve, the outside of the fleece downward. A little shaking of the fleece takes place to remove any dirt that can be worked out in this way, and then the fleece is tied up and you have a skirted fleece.

The demand for light shrinkage wool became so keen that as high as $7,000 a head was paid for stud rams in Australia that gave promise of producing a sheep with light shrinkage wool, and a new breed of sheep was developed, called the Corridale, that produces a light shrinkage wool containing less grease than other sheep of the merino blood.

Practically all of the light shrinkage wool of the world was shipped to London. Occasionally American buyers went to Australia and purchased this light shrinkage wool and shipped it direct to America; but usually all of it was shipped to London and there opened up and sold at auction, which is the custom on the London market.

This light shrinkage wool was set out by itself and marked "fit for American use," not because we use any different class of wool in America than that of any other country, but because of the light shrink, and only the American buyers bid on this wool. Sometimes the bidding was keen, for the lighter the shrink the smaller the amount of duty he would have to pay when it reached the American port.

Through these manipulations the shrinkage was brought down from 66 $\frac{2}{3}$  per cent, which the law presumed the average wools of the world would shrink and upon which all the manufacturers' compensatory duty has been based, until the average shrink of all our imported wools under the Payne-Aldrich Act was not more than 40 per cent. So, for example, if the American manufacturer bought a hundred pounds of wool on the London market that would shrink 66 $\frac{2}{3}$  per cent and brought it to America and paid his duty of 11 cents a pound, or \$11 for the package, he would have 33 $\frac{1}{2}$  pounds of clean wool. On the other hand, if he bought a hundred pounds of wool on the London market, with a shrinkage of only 40 per cent, he would pay the same amount of duty of \$11 and he would have 60 pounds of clean wool.

Out of the package with a shrinkage of 66 $\frac{2}{3}$  per cent, out of which he would have 33 $\frac{1}{2}$  pounds of clean wool, based on 4 pounds of wool to a pound of cloth, he would be able to produce 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  pounds of cloth. Out of his package, on which he paid the same duty of \$11, with a shrinkage of only 40 per cent, out of which he would have 60 pounds of clean wool, on the same basis of 4 pounds of wool to a pound of cloth, he would be able to produce 15 pounds of cloth.

By importing these light shrinking wools, instead of the woolgrower getting a protection of 33 cents a pound on the scoured wool, as the law provided for, his protection was only 18 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound on the scoured basis.

And this is how Schedule K permitted the manufacturer to appropriate to himself the protection the woolgrower believed he was entitled to receive.

On wools paying a duty of 18 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound on the scoured basis the manufacturers' true compensatory duty should have been 24 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents on a pound of cloth, and yet every pound of cloth imported into America under the Payne-Aldrich Act—even if not more than 50 per cent of it was made of wool under the valuation that was fixed—paid a compensatory duty of 44 cents a pound. In this way the manufacturer received a compensatory duty of 19 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound on a pound of cloth more than he was entitled to.

I wonder if there is anyone in America so simple as to think that the people received any benefit from the compensatory duty that the manufacturer made out of this manipulation of Schedule K. It is said by some that the manufacturer did not always take advantage of the full amount of the hidden duty, as it is called. The manufacturer rarely ever sells his cloth direct to the merchant tailors of the country. The jobber is the last man between the woolgrower and the people, and if the manufacturer was ever kind enough to leave anything I am sure the jobber, from what I know of him, would not be slow to take advantage of it.

I had the honor to be president of the National Woolgrowers' Association of America a few years ago, and at that time I made an investigation into the cost of a yard of cloth. I followed the wool from the Western States to Boston, through the hands of the commission merchant who sells it to the manufacturer, and then through the manufacturer into the hands of the jobber. I found that it was the custom in this country for our woolen mills to operate largely on orders taken from these jobbing concerns. They enter into a contract with the mills designating certain patterns of cloth to be made. Then I followed that yard of cloth from the jobber to the merchant tailors of the country, and this is what I found: That the jobber took more for distributing that yard of cloth to some of the small merchant tailors of the country than all the other forces combined that entered into its production. This includes the woolgrower that grew the wool, the railroad that hauled the wool to Boston, the commission merchant that sold it to the manufacturer, and the manufacturer that manufactured it into a yard of cloth. So, if the manufacturer was ever kind enough to leave any of the hidden duty, this soft-hearted jobber, who runs true to his name, I am sure would take what little there was left.

The importation of wools under the Payne-Aldrich Act was so small in amount that that of itself is conclusive proof that the duties in that act were so high that they acted in a large measure as an embargo. Under that act the importation of manufactured wools was as follows: 1909, $18,102,461; 1910, $23,532,175; 1911, $18,569,791; 1912, $14,912,619.

Why, I find that the city of Washington, with its half million people, pays more for its manufactured wools every year than the value of the wools imported into this country under the Payne-Aldrich Act.

[At this point Mr. GOODING yielded the floor for the day.]

Friday, July 29, 1921.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, it is at this point in my remarks that I want to take up and pay my respects to the Fordney bill. The Fordney bill assesses all duties on imports on the American valuation. I can understand how, with a fair and just law, the American valuation may be accepted; but under the Fordney bill, as far as the schedule on wool and wools is concerned, with the 35 per cent ad valorem duty on wool, it is un-American, unfair, and unjust, and a menace to good citizenship, the seriousness of which I shall not discuss at this time.

The Fordney bill not only permits the American manufacturer to fix his own duties upon which the basis for his protection is given but under the law, with the 35 per cent ad valorem duty on wool, he will fix the protection for the woolgrower, for the manufacturer is the only market for American wool, and he alone fixes the price on every pound of wool produced in America. Any law that permits one industry to become the master, and subjects the other to its mercy, is a crime against American principles and one that can not be tolerated by any red-blooded American.

I shall have no trouble in showing Senators that what Schedule K permitted the manufacturer to do to take from the woolgrower his protection the Fordney bill, if it passed without amendment, will also do for him. It will not be necessary in Australia to skirt wool any longer or for the flockmaster to pay fancy prices for stud rams that give promise of producing sheep with a light shrinkage wool, nor will it be necessary to set out wool in London marked "fit for American use." The Fordney bill will do the job and will do it well.

In order to understand the protection the bill gives to the manufacturer, it will be necessary to find out what efforts are made by the manufacturer to produce a pound of cloth. Some one has contributed to the cost of that pound of cloth besides the manufacturer. So before we can make a comparison as to what the manufacturer's interest is in a pound of cloth we must find out what his conversion cost is or what his investment and labor represent in a pound of cloth. Reliable information fixes the manufacturer's conversion cost at an average of 40 per cent and the material cost at an average of 60 per cent. In some cases it is over and in others it is under; but it is estimated that when there is a protection on wool that the 40-60 basis is a fair average. This 60 per cent represents the labor of the woolgrowers, the freight on the wool to the markets, the commission merchant's expense, and the expense of scouring the wool, for with the scoured wool is where the manufacturer's labor first begins.

Senators must bear in mind that the compensatory duty is no part of the manufacturer's protection at any time or at any place, for it is only to recompense him for the increased cost of the duty imposed on the raw material in a pound of cloth.

Paragraph 1108, on page 130 of the Fordney bill, reads as follows:

Woven fabrics, weighing not more than 4 ounces per square yard, wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than $1.25 per pound, a compensatory duty of 30 cents per pound, and in addition thereto an ad valorem duty of 22 per cent.

For example, on a dollar's worth of the above-mentioned cloth the ad valorem duty is 22 per cent, or 22 cents. The manufacturer's share of the cost in this dollar is only 40 cents. On the balance of 60 cents he is more than fully protected by his compensatory duty. Therefore this 22 cents ad valorem protection based on the 40 cents of manufacturing cost is equal to exactly 55 per cent ad valorem protection. I challenge any manufacturer or manufacturer's agent to successfully contradict the truth of this statement.

Again, on cloth worth more than $1.25 per yard, the ad valorem duty is 27½ per cent, or 27½ cents on each dollar's worth of cloth. The manufacturing cost being 40 cents on the dollar, as before, and the manufacturer being more than fully protected by his compensatory duty on the balance of 60 cents, which represents the material cost in each dollar of value, we must compute his actual ad valorem protection on the basis of 40 cents. We find that 27½ cents is exactly 68½ per cent of the conversion cost of 40 cents, and 68½ per cent is, therefore, the actual ad valorem protection which the manufacturer receives on this schedule. The truth of this conclusion can not be successfully challenged.

For these reasons, I submit to the Senate that the 27½ per cent ad valorem duty laid down in the bill is misleading.

The protection in the Fordney bill can properly be called a hidden and secret protection. It is misleading and contrary to all accepted standards of justice and fair play. If the manufacturer is to be given 68½ per cent ad valorem protection in this schedule, why not say so in plain words, in language all can understand, instead of concealing it under the guise of a 27½ per cent ad valorem duty on the cost of the entire pound of cloth, which without a careful investigation is misleading and deceptive?

Continuing, paragraph 1108, page 130, line 10, reads:

Valued at not more than $1.25 per pound, a compensatory duty of 36 cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, 27½ per cent ad valorem.

Again the manufacturer's conversion cost remains the same, regardless of the cost of the cloth. The foreigner must pay 27½ per cent ad valorem duty on all cloth valued at above $1.25 per pound, but the manufacturer's conversion cost again is only 40 per cent, so that his ad valorem duty on his conversion cost is 68½ per cent. Here I desire to call attention to his compensatory duty of 36 cents on a pound of cloth valued at more than $1.25. With the manufacturer fixing his own valuation, half of this cloth may be made out of mungo or cheap shoddy, and yet his compensatory duty is 36 cents a pound.

Continuing, paragraph 1108, page 130, line 12, reads:

Provided, That if the warp of any of the foregoing is wholly of cotton or other vegetable fiber, the compensatory duty shall be 25 cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, if the fabric is valued at not more than $1.25 per pound, an ad valorem duty of 22 per cent; if valued at more than $1.25 per pound, an ad valorem duty of 27½ per cent.

So we see that if the warp is made out of cotton or vegetable fiber, regardless of what the material in the fabric is, the manufacturer is given a compensatory duty of 25 cents per pound, and he still has his ad valorem duty of 22 per cent on the entire cost, which is 55 per cent on his cost of conversion.

If the fabric is valued at more than $1.25 per pound, even if the warp is wholly of cotton or other vegetable fiber, 27½ per cent ad valorem, the protection that he receives on his conversion cost is again 68½ per cent.

I do not know why the manufacturers of this country are entitled to a compensatory duty on cotton that is used in woolen goods when cotton is on the free list. Here let me say to the Senators from the South, I am going to help make a fight for protection for the cotton planter; I am going to stand for and vote for protection to every southern industry that needs protection.

PAR. 1109. Woven fabrics weighing more than 4 ounces per square yard, wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 75 cents per pound, a compensatory duty of 20 cents per pound, and in addition thereto an ad valorem duty of 18 per cent.

This is the lowest ad valorem duty that the manufacturer receives under the Fordney bill. On his conversion cost he will receive, however, an ad valorem duty of 45 per cent. In addition to this, there is a compensatory duty of 20 cents, which may be in some cases close to the value of the whole fabric.

I quote further from the wool schedule of the Fordney bill:

Valued at more than 75 cents, but not more than $1.25 per pound, a compensatory duty of 25 cents per pound, and in addition thereto an ad valorem duty of 21 per cent.

The manufacturer is receiving on his conversion cost here an ad valorem duty of 51½ per cent.

Valued at more than $1.25, but not more than $2.50 per pound, a compensatory duty of 30 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 24 per cent ad valorem.

Here the manufacturer is receiving 60 per cent of an ad valorem duty.

When valued at more than $2.50 per pound, a compensatory duty of 36 cents per pound, and in addition thereto an ad valorem duty of 27½ per cent.

Again, the manufacturer is receiving an ad valorem duty of 68½ per cent on his conversion cost.

On page 131, paragraph 1111 reads as follows:

Pile fabrics (velvets and plushes), cut or uncut, whether or not the pile covers the whole surface, made of wool or of which wool is a component material, whether or not constituting chief value, and manufactures, in any form, made or cut from such pile fabrics, 36 cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, 27½ per cent ad valorem.

There is no value fixed on pile fabrics. The sky is the limit. Regardless of their value, the manufacturers' ad valorem duty is 68½ per cent on the conversion cost and the compensatory duty is 36 cents a pound.

Paragraph 1112, on the same page, reads as follows:

Blankets, wholly or in part of wool, not exceeding 3 yards in length, plain woven, with not more than one color in warp or filling, and not advanced beyond weaving by any process of finishing, valued at not more than 75 cents per pound, 20 cents per pound and, in addition thereto, 20 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 75 cents but not more than $1.50 per pound, 25 cents per pound and, in addition thereto, 20 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $1.50 per pound, 30 cents per pound and, in addition thereto, 20 per cent ad valorem.

In the case of blankets the manufacturers' ad valorem duty on his conversion cost is 50 per cent, and the compensatory duty is from 20 to 30 cents per pound. Most of this stuff is made out of mungo.

Paragraph 1113, on page 132, reads as follows:

Felts, not woven, wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 75 cents per pound, a compensatory duty of 20 cents per pound and, in addition thereto, an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent.

In this paragraph the manufacturer is given an ad valorem duty on his conversion cost of 50 per cent, and the same is true of felts valued at more than 75 cents but not more than $1.50 per pound, on which there is a compensatory duty of 25 cents per pound and, in addition thereto, an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent.

Valued at more than $1.50 per pound, a compensatory duty of 30 cents per pound and, in addition thereto, an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent.

Here the manufacturer is given a compensatory duty of 62½ per cent on his conversion cost.

The protection on wool in the Fordney bill reads as follows:

Wools, not specially provided for, and hair of the angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals, imported in the grease or washed, 25 cents per pound of clean content; imported in the scoured state, 26 cents per pound; imported on the skin, 24 cents per pound of clean content; Provided, That none of the foregoing shall pay a higher rate of duty than 35 per cent ad valorem.

I desire to show to Senators what the Fordney bill will do for the manufacturers if it is enacted into a law without amendment. I shall have no trouble in showing that it is the most vicious and dangerous measure ever passed in the House of Representatives by any political party. Again, I want to say that the Fordney bill makes the manufacturer the master and places a power in his hands that I am sure Schedule K, if it came back to life, would be ashamed of.

This is what will happen: When a cargo of wool reaches an American port the Government experts will determine its grade, and then they will take the quotation on that class of wool and figure out through this ad valorem duty of 35 per cent how much duty the manufacturer will pay on each grade of wool. The lower the manufacturer can beat down the price of wool on the American market the less duty he will have to pay, and the smaller the duty he pays on a pound of wool the greater will be his protection on a pound of cloth through his compensatory duty, for the law says that his compensatory duty shall be 36 cents a pound on fabrics worth above $1.25 a pound. That compensatory duty will always be there. He can go to bed at night and get up in the morning and know that the 36 cents is as dependable as the tide itself. I am sure that a fabric that is only worth $1.25 a pound, American valuation, is not made out of all wool; some of it will be of mungo; but, regardless of what the material is in the fabric that is worth more than $1.25 a pound, the importer will pay a compensatory duty of 36 cents on a pound of cloth, and on top of that he will pay an ad valorem duty of 27½ per cent, American valuation, in which the manufacturer has but 40 per cent of the conversion cost of that cloth which is worth more than $1.25 per pound. The manufacturer is not only protected by an ad valorem duty of 68½ per cent on his efforts in that pound of cloth, but his compensatory duty of 36 cents will, in many cases, act as an embargo on the cheaper fabrics.

If this bill shall be passed without amendment, the manufacturer's protection, when his compensatory duty, to which he is not entitled, and his ad valorem duty are computed, will be anywhere from 62½ to 200 per cent.

In order that Senators may understand how it is done and how the 35 per cent ad valorem duty will be an inducement to beat down the price of wool on the American markets, I will read a telegram from Jeremiah Williams & Co., of Boston, giving the value of wool on the Boston markets and on the London markets, and at the same time I will show how the manufacturer is interested in beating down the price of American wool, and what it means to him with a fixed compensatory duty of 36 cents a pound on a pound of cloth. The telegram is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., June 30, 1921.

F. R. GOODING,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Scoured value, Ohio fine clothing, 75 cents; London value, 50 cents. Ohio fine staple, 85 cents; London value, 60 cents. Valuation western wools, fine long staple, 75 cents; London, 55 cents. Fine short staple, 65 cents; London, 50 cents. Half blood, 60; London, 40 cents. Three-eighths, 50 cents; London, 30 cents. Quarter blood, 35 cents; London, 22 cents.

JEREMIAH WILLIAMS & Co.

I might say that this is one of the oldest commission firms in Boston.

All wools with a value of more than 71½ cents on the scoured basis will receive the full amount of protection provided in the Fordney bill.

On the basis of 4 pounds of wool to make a pound of cloth the manufacturer's compensatory duty on a pound of cloth should be 33½ cents; but the Fordney bill gives him 36 cents on a pound of cloth, or 2½ cents more than he is entitled to under any law that has ever been passed, or more than has ever been claimed in the past by the manufacturers themselves.

About 30 per cent of the wool of America to-day will receive the full amount of protection provided in the Fordney bill, which is 25 cents a pound on the clean content. On cloth made out of this 30 per cent the manufacturer by every rule and every law that has been accepted will receive on cloth valued at over $1.25 a pound a compensatory duty of 2½ cents a pound more than he is entitled to. Two and two-thirds cents, figured on the basis of the manufacturer's conversion cost of 40 cents, is equal to 5½ per cent. Again I want to say that the manufacturer is not entitled to any part of a compensatory duty more than enough to recompense him for the difference in the cost of his raw material. No honest law will give it to him. So the manufacturer's ad valorem duty is increased from 68½ per cent to 73.95 per cent.

On short fine-staple wools, valued at 65 cents on the clean content on the Boston market, the woolgrower will receive a protection of 22½ cents a pound; the manufacturer's true compensatory duty should be 30½ cents on a pound. The Fordney bill gives him a compensatory duty of 36 cents on a pound of cloth when its value is above $1.25 a pound, or 5½ cents more than he is entitled to. Five and two-thirds cents, figured on the basis of the manufacturer's conversion cost of 40 per cent, is equivalent to 11 per cent, and so the manufacturer's ad valorem duty will be increased from 68½ per cent to 79½ per cent.

On half-blood wools, valued at 60 cents a pound on the clean content on the Boston market, the woolgrower will receive a protection of 21 cents a pound; the manufacturer's true compensatory duty should be 28½ cents. The Fordney bill gives him 36 cents on a pound of cloth valued at above $1.25 a pound, or 8 cents more than he is entitled to. Eight cents, figured on the basis of the manufacturer's conversion cost of 40 per cent, is equivalent to 15 per cent, and so the manufacturer's ad valorem duty will be increased from 68½ per cent to 83½ per cent.

On three-eighths blood wool, valued at 50 cents a pound on the clean content on the Boston market, the woolgrower will receive a protection of 17½ cents a pound. The manufacturer's true duty should be 23½ cents a pound. The Fordney bill gives him 36 cents on a pound of cloth valued at above $1.25 a pound, or 12½ cents more than he is entitled to. Twelve and two-thirds cents, figured on the basis of the manufacturer's conversion cost of 40 per cent, is equivalent to 25 per cent, and so the manufacturer's ad valorem duty will be increased from 68½ per cent to 93½ per cent.

On quarter-blood wool, with a valuation of 35 cents a pound on the clean content on the Boston market, the woolgrower will receive a protection of 12½ cents a pound; the manufacturer's true compensatory duty should be 16½ cents on a pound of cloth. The Fordney bill gives him a compensatory duty of 36 cents on a pound of cloth valued at more than $1.25, or 19½ cents per pound more than he is entitled to. Nineteen and two-thirds cents, figured on the basis of the manufacturer's conversion cost of 40 per cent, is equivalent to 39 per cent, and so the manufacturer's ad valorem duty will be increased from 68½ per cent to 107½ per cent, and I am sure that we can leave it to the manufacturer to see that all cloth valued at above $1.25 a pound will receive the full 36 cents compensatory duty that is provided in paragraph 1108.

Reviewing the Fordney bill briefly, we find that it reduces the compensatory duty on a pound of high-priced cloth from 44 cents in the Payne-Aldrich bill to 36 cents in the Fordney bill.

The compensatory duty on the cheaper fabrics has been reduced from 22 cents in the Payne-Aldrich bill to 20 cents in the Fordney bill. As to the reduction of the compensatory duties on the cheaper fabrics, it is of little concern. They are still so high that they will act as an embargo, for in many cases the compensatory duty alone will be equal to the value of a pound of these cheap fabrics.

The Fordney bill has reduced the duty on a pound of scoured wool from 33 cents in the Payne-Aldrich bill to 25 cents in the Fordney bill. It has reduced the duty on a pound of grease wool from 11 cents a pound in the Payne-Aldrich bill to 8½ cents a pound in the Fordney bill, and then it provides "that none of the foregoing shall pay a higher rate of duty than 35 per cent ad valorem," which may mean that the woolgrower will not receive 10 cents duty on a clean pound of the cheaper grades of wool.

The manufacturer's 4 pounds of wool in the grease, shrinking 66½ per cent, that was given in the Payne-Aldrich bill to make a pound of cloth, has been increased in the Fordney bill to 4½ pounds of wool, shrinking 66½ per cent.

It is impossible to tell just what the manufacturer's increase in his ad valorem duties will be until he gets through fixing his own valuations. I am informed that he is already fixing up his mill books. Until he gets through that job, it will be impossible to tell what the increase will be.

Mr. President, I have a very high regard for the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. Probably no men are dealing with greater problems than those gentlemen, and I can understand how mistakes can be made on these difficult schedules.

I am sure that the Ways and Means Committee do not understand that they are giving the manufacturer an ad valorem duty of from 45 per cent up to 107 per cent, and in some cases, where shoddy is used, 200 per cent.

Surely they would not frame and pass in the House of Representatives such a bill as this, that gives such unreasonable ad valorem duties and that makes one industry a master over the other, if they thoroughly understood this technical schedule.

These duties given to the manufacturers in the Fordney bill, where shoddy is used, it must be admitted will act as an embargo. When the great principle of protection is used as an embargo in the interest of any industry, there is grave danger of breaking down and destroying that principle, for a time at least, in America. To me this is a very serious matter.

No man in the Senate is a more ardent protectionist than I am. I am willing to give any industry its fair and honest protection, but I am not willing to give any industry an embargo.

Some of the members of the Ways and Means Committee said that they were placing the 35 per cent ad valorem duty on wools because some wools would receive too much protection without it. Thirty-five per cent ad valorem is enough for the great wool industry of the country; 200 per cent is not any too much for the shoddy manufacturers.

The question is, Mr. President, Is the live-stock industry worth saving? There is very little difference in the cost of production of the different grades of wool in America. I am willing to give to the manufacturers a reasonable protection that will insure prosperity of their industries. If the live-stock industry is worth saving, it is entitled to the same consideration.

To make up our breeding herds we must have sheep of the merino blood, that produce the high-priced wools at the present time, and we must have sheep of the English blood for producing the cheaper grades of wool at the present time. To bring about the ideal sheep for America a cross between these different breeds is necessary.

So if you cripple one branch of the industry you cripple the whole industry. The average price of western wool on the Boston market to-day is 61 cents a pound on the clean content. From the West the rate on a pound of grease wool is 3.46 cents, and it takes 3 pounds of Idaho wool in the grease to make a pound of clean wool. That means that the woolgrower must pay 10.8 cents freight rate on a pound of clean wool to Boston. The cost to the woolgrower of selling wool in Boston is 2½ cents on the grease pound. So here again there is a charge of 7½ cents on a pound of scoured wool. For scouring the cost is 2 cents a pound. Here is another 8 cents, making a total of 24.3 cents to market a pound of scoured wool, which leaves the woolgrower the magnificent sum of 36.7 cents per pound for clean or scoured wool.

Unless the woolgrower is given adequate protection and an honest deal, and can reduce his expenses, as I think he can do if the country gets back to normal, we can not go on with the wool industry in America.

Mr. President, the woolgrowers of the country are asking for a just law, one which, when it says 11 cents a pound, means 11 cents a pound.

There is no trouble, Mr. President, about passing a law that will give the woolgrowers practically all the protection the law provides for them if we will commence by placing a specific duty on the clean content of a pound of grease wool.

And then let the manufacturer's compensatory duty be based on the price he pays for wool in the Boston market. The world's market for wool is London; it is there that the price of wool for the world is made. The American woolgrower is entitled to receive in Boston somewhere near the London prices, plus the amount of duty this Government gives to wool. The market prices of wool are as well established as the market prices of wheat or of cotton, and when the American manufacturer forces the price of wool down in Boston below the London prices, plus the duty that the Government puts on wool, say 5 per cent, then there should be a 5 per cent reduction in his compensatory duties. If he forces it down 20 per cent, then let his compensatory duties be reduced 20 per cent. If it is 50 per cent, then reduce his compensatory duties 50 per cent. If it is 100 per cent, then he is not entitled to any compensatory duty at all.

It is just as easy for an expert to tell the different grades of wool in a pound of cloth as it is for him to tell the different grades of wool in the grease. Unless protection is given to the woolgrowers in this way you might just as well put wool on the free list; but if you do, it will be well to put the manufacturer's products on the free list at the same time. The agricultural and live-stock interests are asking for a square deal, for the same consideration that is given other industries—that and nothing more.

I do not know whether Senators will agree with me that the live-stock industry is different from any other industry in America, but nevertheless that is true. Out in the West the mine owners have closed down their mines, the timbermen have closed down their sawmills. Here in the East and the South some of our industrial plants are closed down, and it is said that 5,000,000 men are out of employment.

But it is different with the breeding herds of the country. There are no Sundays, no holidays; it is always 365 days in the year that they must be cared for. They must be fed and protected and have constant care night and day. I know of no greater responsibility than the care of live stock. Eternal vigilance must be the watchword to success in the live-stock industry. When the storms rage the hardest it is then they must have the greatest care, and many lives have been sacrificed in the heroic effort to protect live stock in some of those fearful blizzards that sweep over our western plains.

The only stopping place is the slaughterhouse, and the slaughterhouse has been catching a great many of them, for the census of sheep shows that in one short year there has been a reduction of almost 14,000,000 head. In 1900 the census showed 61,503,713 sheep in America. On January 1, 1919, the census showed that there were 48,866,000 sheep in the country. The most alarming reduction of all is shown in the census of January 1, 1920, in which the number is given as 34,984,524. Flockmasters have not only sent their sheep to the slaughterhouse—they have stopped breeding.

Mr. President, I know that if this schedule is enacted into law that the woolgrower will give up the fight, and the wool industry at least will be lost to America; and some day, when it is too late, the American people will learn the true value of the live-stock industry to civilization itself.

The winter I was in Washington making an investigation of the cost of a pound of cloth, which I have referred to in my remarks, I read of a strike in the woolen mills at Lawrence, Mass. There were sixteen hundred strikers in a hall there, and there was a call for the appointment of five committees. There were to be five on each committee and each committee was to represent a different nationality. When it came to the appointment of the English-speaking committee, it was found that there were only three of the sixteen hundred who could speak the English language.

I am willing to give the manufacturer of the East a fair and an honest protection regardless of the class of labor he employs. But I see no reason why the manufacturer of the East should be given 200 to 300 per cent more protection than the industries of the West, and if legislation can be passed that authorizes one industry to rob another, and makes one class the master and the other class the slave, I want to know something about it; and it is high time that the West understands what part it is to play in the affairs of this Government.

The Republican Party has not given the West a square deal in the tariff laws for a number of years. But unless it does give the West a square deal in the new tariff law it may just as well be understood first as last that it will not receive my support. With me it is going to be a square deal for the West or a fight.

Mr. President, there are certain great fundamental principles in this life which, if accepted and observed by the people, lead the Nation onward; but if those principles are ignored the virile forces of manhood are lost, and that Nation goes down to decay.

History teaches us that the neglect of the soil by the Roman Empire contributed much to its downfall. During the last years of life of that great Empire the soil was so poor that it only produced an average of 4 bushels of wheat to the acre. The citizenship of Rome, like its soil, lost its virile force, and that mighty Empire went down to decay.

In my judgment live stock is the most important industry to humanity in all the world. In every country where live stock has been neglected, civilization has had a hard struggle to exist. I remember a few years ago reading that in one of the great States of the Union a large portion of the male population of two counties were indicted for selling their votes. Investigation showed that they were living upon farms where the soil was exhausted; farms that were once fertile but from lack of live stock and proper rotation the soil had become exhausted, and it was a struggle on those farms to sustain life. The citizenship, like the soil, had gone backward.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that it is necessary for the live stock to come in touch with the soil, or that the barnyard must be cleaned and hauled out upon the farm, but I do want to be understood, Mr. President, as saying that the soil must be fed, just as you and I must be, and it must have a balanced ration by what is known as a rotation of crops if it is to remain fertile. Practically all the crops that live stock consume feed the soil. On the other hand, practically all the crops the human race consume exhaust the fertility of the soil.

There must be a balanced condition maintained by the rotation of crops such as clover, alfalfa, corn, wheat, and other crops if we are to grow enough in America upon our farms to feed our own people.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the live-stock industry of America should be watched over and cared for next to the citizenship itself, for our wealth in America will always be measured by the productiveness of our soil.

Out in the great arid West, where the rainfalls have always been light, and where very little vegetation is grown, there the soil is very poor when it is first turned over by the plow, and to make it rich we must plant alfalfa or clover or something else which live stock consumes, and then it is brought up to be the richest soil in all the world. But if you destroy our live stock, our breeding herds, in the West, so that they can not be maintained, in a few years the fertility of the soil of the Western States will be lost, and those great Commonwealths, instead of going onward, will go backward. They will not be the factors they have been and should be for the feeding of the Nation and at the same time furnish a market for the finished products of the East.

Break down and destroy the breeding herds of America, and the great corn belt in the States of Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska will be seriously crippled, for it is from the breeding herds of the Western and Southwestern States that millions of live stock are shipped into the feeding yards of those States every year to consume the corn and forage that grows in the greatest of all corn belts in the world.

Mr. President, the new tariff bill that is before Congress can save or destroy the live-stock industry in America. I do not know what the verdict will be, but if in my service here in the United States Senate I can in any way impress upon the Senators the importance of live stock to civilization I shall feel that my work has not been in vain.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to offer some amendments to House bill 7456. I ask that they be printed as a part of my remarks and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendments submitted by Mr. GOODING, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7456, the tariff bill, were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 128, strike out lines 9 to 23, both inclusive, and insert the following:

PAR. 1101. Wools, not improved by the admixture of merino or English blood, such as Donskoi native Smyrna, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, and other wools of like character or description, and half of the camel, 10 cents per pound. The duty on such wools, imported on the skin, shall be 9 cents per pound.

PAR. 1102. Wools, not specially provided for, and hair of the Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals, imported in the grease or washed, shall pay duty at the following rates:

If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 93 per cent, 1.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 90 and does not exceed 93 per cent, 2.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 87 and does not exceed 90 per cent, 3.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 84 and does not exceed 87 per cent, 4.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 81 and does not exceed 84 per cent, 5.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 78 and does not exceed 81 per cent, 6.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 75 and does not exceed 78 per cent, 7.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 72 and does not exceed 75 per cent, 8.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 69 and does not exceed 72 per cent, 9.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 66 and does not exceed 69 per cent, 10.6 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 63 and does not exceed 66 per cent, 11.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 60 and does not exceed 63 per cent, 12.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 57 and does not exceed 60 per cent, 13.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 54 and does not exceed 57 per cent, 14.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 51 and does not exceed 54 per cent, 15.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 48 and does not exceed 51 per cent, 16.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 45 and does not exceed 48 per cent, 17.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 42 and does not exceed 45 per cent, 18.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 39 and does not exceed 42 per cent, 19.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 36 and does not exceed 39 per cent, 20.5 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 33 and does not exceed 36 per cent, 21.4 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 30 and does not exceed 33 per cent, 22.4 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 27 and does not exceed 30 per cent, 23.4 cents per pound;
 If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 24 and does not exceed 27 per cent, 24.4 cents per pound;

If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 21 and does not exceed 24 per cent, 25.4 cents per pound;

If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 18 and does not exceed 21 per cent, 26.4 cents per pound;

If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 15 and does not exceed 18 per cent, 27.4 cents per pound;

If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 12 and does not exceed 15 per cent, 28.4 cents per pound;

If the shrinkage in cleaning exceeds 10 and does not exceed 12 per cent, 29.4 cents per pound;

If the shrinkage in cleaning does not exceed 10 per cent, 33 cents per pound;

The duty on such wools, imported in the scoured state, shall be 33 cents per pound;

The duty on such wools, imported on the skin, shall be 1 cent less per pound than is imposed in this paragraph on other wools of the same class and condition; and

On page 95, line 6, strike out the figures "15" and insert the figures "20."

On page 94, strike out lines 13 to 16, inclusive, and insert the following:

"PAR. 701. Cattle, less than 2 years old, 2 cents per pound; 2 years old or over, 2½ cents per pound; fresh beef and veal, 3 cents per pound; tallow, 2 cents per pound; oleo oil and oleo stearin, 2 cents per pound."

On page 94, strike out lines 17 and 18 and insert the following:

"PAR. 702. Sheep and goats, 2 cents per pound; fresh mutton, 3 cents per pound; fresh lamb, 5 cents per pound."

On page 109, after line 17, insert the following:

"PAR. 782. Hides of cattle, raw or uncured, 1½ cents per pound; dry cured, 5 cents per pound."

On page 129, strike out all of paragraph 1106, and instead thereof insert the following:

"PAR. 1106. Wool which has been advanced in any manner by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, and not specifically provided for, including tops and roving, 35 cents per pound and, in addition thereto, 10 per cent ad valorem."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a resolution adopted at a meeting held July 18, 1921, by Charles W. Clark Post, No. 152, American Legion, of Lowell, Mich., favoring the granting of adjusted compensation to veterans of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Battle Creek, Clare, Dowagiac, and Glenwood, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation making stringent regulations for the observance of Sunday in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Sumner, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation making stringent regulations for the observance of Sunday, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIS presented the memorial of A. C. Gray and other citizens of Dresden, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I introduced heretofore some amendments to the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I desire to reintroduce some of those amendments to the substitute offered by the committee, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). They may be presented at the time the bill is considered, if the Senator prefers.

Mr. BURSUM. I desire to have them printed and lie on the table. They are as follows:

Amend section 23, line 6, page 4, by striking out the word "July" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "October."

Amend line 14, page 4, by striking out the word "two" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "three."

Amend line 20, page 5, by striking out the word "two" and inserting

in lieu thereof the word "three."

Amend line 9, page 6, by striking out the word "two" and inserting

in lieu thereof the word "three."

Amend line 21, page 6, by striking out the word "July" and in-serting in lieu thereof the word "October."

Amend section 27 by inserting after the word "institution," on line

10, the words "including cooperative associations."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2306) to authorize the Secretary of War to release a certain right of way no longer needed for military purposes at Springfield Armory, Massachusetts, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 237) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2307) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 238) thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 65) to grant medals to survivors and heirs of volunteers of the Port Hudson forlorn-hope storming party, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 239) thereon.

Mr. RANDELL (for Mr. NORBECK), from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 240) thereon.

JOINT COMMISSION ON POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I present a supplementary report of the Joint Commission on Postal Service created by the act of April 24, 1920, which was authorized to investigate especially all methods and systems which relate to the handling, delivery, and dispatching of the mails in the large cities of the United States. This report deals particularly with additional facilities needed at New York City.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] desires to submit a minority report, and I ask that it be printed with the majority report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts subsequently said: Mr. President, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] this morning presented a majority report from the Joint Commission on Postal Service dealing with additional facilities in New York City. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], myself, and one Member of the House serving on the joint commission feel that it is our duty to submit the views of the minority, and I send to the desk a report embodying the views of the minority on that commission upon two recommendations of the majority. I ask that the views of the minority be printed with the majority report.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the report of the majority been printed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It was filed an hour or more ago.

Mr. CURTIS. And the Senator desires to have them printed together?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] in presenting the majority report stated that the two are to be printed together.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no objection to that, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Without objection, the views of the minority will be printed with the report of the majority.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2332) for the relief of Charles W. Anderson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2333) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 2334) for the relief of the Advance Manufacturing Co. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 2335) to authorize the War Finance Corporation to purchase and sell certain securities now held or hereafter acquired by the Director General of Railroads; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 2336) granting an increase of pension to John A. Shannon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 91) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to adjust a transaction relating to 3,500 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

EXPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1915) to provide for the purchase of farm products in the United States, to sell the same in foreign countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. In view of the situation now in the Senate I thought I would be justified in asking unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business in order that the Senate might proceed with the consideration of House bill 7294, supplemental to the national prohibition act. I therefore make that request.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I had hoped that this morning the discussion of the agricultural bill might go on. However, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture is absent to-day on account of illness, and I am informed that he would like to be present and hear the discussion; at least he would like to be here when the vote is taken. It might be profitable to go along with the discussion, but I would not want to ask for a vote to-day. In view of his absence, however, and the splendid work he has done as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in initiating work of this character I have no objection to the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon if there would be any objection to an attempt to get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the pending bill some day early next week, and if it would not be wise to make such an attempt. As to-day is Friday, I assume that we will adjourn over until Monday, and we can not do anything to-morrow; but if we could have a time fixed for taking a vote on the pending bill early next week, I think it would be very helpful.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator from Oregon if there would be any objection to our going on with this bill to-morrow if the condition of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture will permit? It is a matter of such vital importance that the sooner we reach a determination of it the better. We have all the data we are going to get, and I should think there is no reason why, under the stress of circumstances, we should not go on to-morrow, if the condition of the Senator from Nebraska will justify it.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that in deference to the chairman of the committee, who has put much work upon this measure, I thought it might be well to wait a day and see if he could not be present when the discussion took place in the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator if he has reason to believe that the Senator from Nebraska will be able to attend to-morrow, in case we should have a session to-morrow?

Mr. McNARY. No; I am not informed as to how he may be to-morrow physically, but I thought it might be well to-day to let the bill go over and return to-morrow, and have the discussion take place at that time.

Mr. SMITH. Let me make a suggestion. In view of the request made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Sterling], if that should be agreed upon, I suggest that we defer any definite action as to when we shall take up the Norris bill until later in the day, by which time we can confer with the Senator from Nebraska and find out whether he will be able to attend to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not possible to dispose of the unfinished business to-day? There has already been much discussion upon it, and I have heard a number of Senators, who had intended to speak, say that they are not going to speak if we may be allowed to vote upon the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I think that is true. I do not wish to occupy more than five minutes. I understand the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette] wishes to speak at length.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, this question does not concern only one side of the Chamber. While one side controls, both sides desire to be heard, and there are some on our side who wish to be heard.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that we go right on with the unfinished business to-day and to-morrow and every day until we reach a vote upon it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Including Sunday.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires to come here and speak on Sunday, he will no doubt have a larger audience in the galleries than would be the case during the week.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator from Utah understand that the Senator from Nebraska desires to have the unfinished business go over until he can be present?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear that statement made.

Mr. KELLOGG. That statement has been made.

Mr. McNARY. I understand objection has been made to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. STERLING. I did not understand that there was objection made.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I object, and I think there have been a number of objections.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Although I can not draw as large an audience as the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], I must object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not help feeling that the objection to the request was made under a misconception of the situation. As I understood the Senator from Oregon he said that the Senator from Nebraska, the chairman of the committee, would like to have the bill and the discussion upon it go over at least for a day on account of the condition of his health. Everyone knows that he was exhausted yesterday afternoon and was in very bad condition. It seems to me that a request made by the Senator in charge of the bill under those circumstances, that the bill be laid aside for a day or two, should surely be granted by the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to inform the Senator from Washington that I did not say the Senator from Nebraska desires to be present while the discussion is going on, but I assume that that would be a courtesy to which he is entitled.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would think so. The Senator from Nebraska, of course, has taken very great interest in this measure. Everyone knows that. I believe that when the Senator from Georgia takes that into account he will be willing to withdraw his objection to laying aside the unfinished business temporarily. I should like to see it disposed of.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I understood the Senator from Oregon to say that he wished the matter to go over in deference to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McNARY. I said that I have no objection to the matter going over, outlining my reasons and citing the temporary illness of the Senator from Nebraska, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] desires to be present when the vote is taken, but I did not understand the Senator from Oregon to say that the Senator from Nebraska desires to be here during the discussion of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator has just said that he did not make that statement, but I understood him to make the statement.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If that statement is made by any Senator I will at once withdraw my objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought the Senator would do so, but I was mistaken in so understanding the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would be very glad to withdraw my objection if that were the fact.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In view of the statement of the Senator from Oregon we can proceed with the discussion, and I am satisfied the vote will not be taken until the Senator from Nebraska can be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the objection to the request for unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 7294 has been withdrawn.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not understand that the objection had been withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Georgia to withdraw his objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Georgia said he would withdraw his objection if the request was made upon the ground that the Senator from Nebraska desires to be here during the discussion, but the request was not made upon that ground. It was simply upon the ground that the Senator from Nebraska desires to be here when the vote is taken. I think everyone will concede that to him, and that we ought not to vote in his absence, under those circumstances. There is no objection on his part or on anybody's part, however, to proceeding with the discussion of the bill, as I understand it. I think we ought to go on with this measure and get to the point of voting upon it. If we finish the discussion to-day and are ready to vote, then we can postpone the matter and take up the other measure, in accordance with the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] for unanimous consent to proceed at once with the consideration of House bill 7294, laying aside temporarily the unfinished business?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HARRISON. Regular order!

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a moment, while I did not mention the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] as a reason for my request for unanimous consent, yet I had that in mind. I understood that he wished to be present during the debate and at the time when the vote was taken on the bill. For that reason I thought perhaps there would be little discussion on the pending measure to-day and hence I made the request for unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of House bill 7294.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am quite sure that we would do great injustice to the Senator from Nebraska if we should insist upon his being present during all the discussion. If he is an ill man, we ought to respect his situation and allow him to remain in his room.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request for unanimous consent. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, yesterday at the request of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I offered an amendment to Senate bill 1915, the pending unfinished business, as a substitute. At this time I move that all that part of what is known as the Norris bill—Senate bill 1915—after the enacting clause be stricken out and that the Senate adopt in lieu thereof the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by me on yesterday. It is a committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Secretary will report the amendment. The Chair understands that it is offered as a substitute for the bill and is an amendment of the committee. Having been offered by the committee, it is in order and will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That when used in this act the term 'person' includes partnerships, corporations, and associations, as well as individuals.

"Sec. 2. That section 1 of the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and four additional persons (who shall be the directors first appointed as hereinafter provided) are hereby created a body corporate and politic in deed and in law by the name, style, and title of the War Finance Corporation (herein called the corporation), and shall have succession for a period of 10 years: Provided, That except as otherwise provided by this amendatory act the corporation shall not exercise any of the powers conferred by this act except such as are incidental to the liquidation of its assets and the winding up of its affairs, after six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States."

"Sec. 3. The War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, is amended by adding after section 21 thereof the following new sections:

"Sec. 22. Whenever the board of directors of the corporation shall be of the opinion that conditions arising out of the war, or out of the disruption of foreign trade created by the war, have resulted in or may result in an abnormal surplus accumulation of any staple agricultural product of the United States and that the ordinary banking facilities are inadequate to enable producers of or dealers in such products to carry them until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner, the corporation shall thereupon be empowered to make advances, for periods not exceeding one year from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms, not inconsistent with this act, as it may determine:

"(a) To any person engaged in the United States in producing, dealing in, or marketing any such products, for the purpose of assisting such person to carry such products until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner. Any such advance shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrower is located at the time when such advance is made.

"(b) To any person, Government, or subdivision of Government without the United States purchasing such products, but in no case shall any of the money so advanced be expended without the United States. Every such advance shall be secured by adequate security of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation. The rate of interest charged on any such advance shall be determined by the board of directors. The corporation shall retain power to recall an advance or require additional security at any time.

"(c) To any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which makes or has made an advance or advances to pay such person as is described in paragraph (a) of this section for the purpose therein set forth. The aggregate of advances made to any bank, banker, or trust company shall not exceed the amount remaining unpaid of the advances made by such bank, banker, or trust company for purposes herein described. Such advances shall bear interest at the rates fixed by the corporation.

"SEC. 23. Notwithstanding the limitation of section 1, the advances provided for by section 21 and section 22 of this act may be made until July 1, 1922. The corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such advance or advances through renewals, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for the payment of any advance made under authority of section 21 shall not be extended beyond five years from the date upon which such advance was originally made, and the time for the payment of any advance made under authority of section 22 shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such advance was originally made.

"All advances made under section 21 or under section 22 of this act shall be made against the promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments in writing imposing on the borrower a primary and unconditional obligation to repay the advance at maturity, with interest as stipulated therein, with full and adequate security in each instance by indorsement, guaranty, pledge, or otherwise. The corporation shall retain the power to require additional security at any time."

"SEC. 24. Whenever in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation the public interest may require it, the corporation shall be authorized and empowered to make advances, upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, to any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which may have made advances for agricultural purposes, including the breeding, raising, fattening, and marketing of live stock. Such advance or advances may be made upon the promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments, in such form as to impose on the borrowing bank, banker, or trust company a primary and unconditional obligation to repay the advance at maturity with interest as stipulated therein, and shall be fully and adequately secured in each instance by indorsement, guaranty, pledge, or otherwise. Such advances may be made for a period not exceeding one year, and the corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such advance through renewals, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for the payment of any such advance shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such advance was originally made.

"The corporation may, in exceptional cases, upon such terms not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, purchase from domestic banks, bankers, or trust companies notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other instruments of indebtedness secured by chattel mortgages, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, or other instruments in writing conveying or securing marketable title to staple agricultural products, including live stock. The corporation may from time to time, upon like security, extend the time of payment of any note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument acquired under this section, but the time for the payment of any such note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument shall not be extended beyond two years from the date upon which such note, draft, bill of exchange, or other instrument was acquired by the corporation. The corporation is further authorized, upon such terms as it may prescribe, to purchase, sell, or otherwise deal in debentures, promissory notes, or other obligations, adequately secured, issued by banking corporations organized under section 25 (a) of the Federal reserve act. No such promissory notes, debentures, or other obligations shall be purchased which have a maturity at the time of such purchase of more than five years.

"Advances or purchases may be made under this section at any time prior to July 1, 1922.

"SEC. 25. The aggregate amount of all advances made under sections 21, 22, and 24, and of all notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other securities purchased under section 24 remaining unpaid shall not at any one time exceed $1,000,000,000.

"SEC. 26. The corporation is empowered and authorized to investigate, upon its own initiative or in cooperation with other governmental agencies, foreign market conditions and to advise where disposition may be advantageously made of such agricultural products.

"SEC. 27. Whenever in this act the words 'bank, banker, or trust company' are used they shall be deemed to include any reputable and responsible financing institution with resources adequate to the undertaking contemplated.

"SEC. 28. In order to enable the corporation to carry out the purposes of this act, the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to furnish to the corporation for its confidential use such reports, records, or other information as he may have available relating to financial condition of national banks to which the corporation has made or contemplates making advances, and to make, through his examiners, for the confidential use of the corporation, examinations of banks, bankers, or trust companies, other than national banks, to which the corporation has made or contemplates making advances: Provided, That no such examination shall be made without the consent of such bank, banker, or trust company.

"SEC. 29. No person, bank, banker, or trust company receiving money under the provisions of this act shall loan such money at a rate of interest greater than 2 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of interest charged or received by the corporation upon such money."

"SEC. 4. Section 21 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended by striking out paragraphs (b) and (c) thereof, and by striking out at the beginning of the first paragraph the letter (a).

"SEC. 5. The first paragraph of section 12 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time its notes or bonds in an amount aggregating not more than four times its paid-in capital, such notes or bonds to mature not less than six months nor more than five years from the respective dates of issue, and may be redeemable before maturity at the option of the corporation, as may be stipulated in such notes or bonds, and to bear such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the board of directors, but such rate or rates of interest shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or bonds shall have a first and paramount floating charge on all the assets of the corporation, and the corporation shall not at any time mortgage or pledge any of its assets. Such notes or bonds may be issued at not less than par in payment of any advances authorized by this title, or may be offered for sale publicly or to any individual, firm, corporation, or association at such price or prices as the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may determine."

The power of the corporation to issue notes or bonds may be exercised at any time prior to January 1, 1927, but no notes or bonds shall mature later than July 1, 1927.

"SEC. 6. Paragraph 1 of section 13 of the War Finance Corporation act is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"That the Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the maturity limitations of the Federal reserve act and to regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to discount the direct obligations of member banks secured by such notes or bonds of the corporation and to rediscount notes or other negotiable instruments secured by such notes or bonds and indorsed by a member bank. Discounts or rediscounts under this section shall be at an interest rate equal to the prevailing rate for eligible commercial paper or corresponding maturities."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I think there is a typographical error in the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon, which has just been read, and to which I should like to call his attention. I think that he may wish to correct it. On page 3, line 22, the language reads, "advances to pay such person." The word "pay" clearly should be "any."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 22, before the words "such person," it is proposed to strike out the word "pay" and to insert the word "any," so that it will read:

Or advances to any such person as is described in paragraph (a)—

Mr. SMITH. I think the word "pay" is clearly a misprint and should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will be agreed to.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. I desire to call his attention to subsection (a), page 3, at the top of the page. By the language there loans or assistance from the corporation are in terms confined to those who intend to produce for export or sell for export or hold for export. The bill specifically provides:

For the purpose of assisting such person to carry such products until they can be exported or sold for export in an orderly manner.

I submit to the Senator from Oregon whether or not that would allow any person to secure aid from the War Finance Corporation with a view of holding either his own crop or holding cotton or wheat or other products which he had bought on the home market for resale in this country? Would it not restrict any assistance to those engaged in the export trade?

I have been told by a brother Senator that section 24, beginning on page 5, is intended to cure that objection, but on examination I am sure the Senator from Oregon will see that it does not, because the aid to be given under section 24 is expressly confined to "any bank, banker, or trust company." The individual is entirely left out. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the only place in the bill where the individual can be helped is where the individual will satisfy the directors of the corporation that he intends to export the product instead of holding it for sale to New England mills or Middle States mills or southern mills.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Georgia that my conception of the bill is that it is designed to aid in the exportation to foreign markets of products which are raised in this country. If I understand the Senator from Georgia—there was a little interruption on this side of the Chamber at the time he was speaking—he thinks aid should be extended to all individual producers in the country, irrespective of whether the product is to be consumed domestically or exported for foreign consumption.

Mr. President, yesterday the substitute which has just been read was offered by me at the direction of the Committee on Agriculture. I do not intend to speak of the general distress of the agricultural industry; that matter has been discussed here at length; nor do I intend to go into a discussion of the purposes and aims of legislation of this character, as that also has been discussed and is generally understood. I think such legislation meets with much sympathy in this body.

The substitute amendment was directed to be submitted to the consideration of the Senate by the Senate Committee on Agriculture after it appeared that the objection against the Norris bill was sufficient to defeat it. There was a general, if not a unanimous, desire to have legislation of some kind. The committee in recasting the proposed legislation fashioned it largely after the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I wish, in a very brief way, to refer to the changes which have been made in what is known as the Kellogg amendment. On the first page the only change from the Kellogg amendment is that section 1 defines the word "person," taking the definition bodily from the Norris bill.

The next change occurs at the bottom of page 1. The paragraph commencing on line 7, containing a description of the proposed corporation, is taken almost bodily from the act creating the War Finance Corporation. The personnel of the War Finance Corporation is only disturbed by the addition of the Secretary of Agriculture. It was thought by some members of the committee the Secretary of Agriculture should be a member of the proposed board, and that the other members of the War Finance Corporation should remain intact, upon the theory, Mr. President, that this was purely an agricultural relief bill.

The next change is found on page 2, section 2, in line 18. The Kellogg amendment, on page 2, line 14, reads:

Any such advance shall bear interest at a rate of not less than 1 per cent in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the Federal reserve bank.

In the proposed committee substitute that portion of the provision was omitted, which reads:

less than 1 per cent in excess.

The committee thought, after reflection, that the rates for money loaned should be on a parity with those charged by the Federal reserve banks. Since that time some objection has been made to this provision, it being thought that it would injure the Federal reserve structure, and that a maximum rate should be named, whereas, in the Kellogg amendment, a minimum rate was named.

The next change occurs in line 2 on page 3, the word "producing" being inserted before the word "dealing." That change has been made so as to enable the War Finance Corporation to loan to producers. The provision, I think, Mr. President, will meet some opposition here, and I believe an amendment will be offered whereby the War Finance Corporation will not be called upon to deal directly with the individual producer, but will be confined to associations of persons engaged in the production of agricultural products.

On page 6, line 11, there is an entirely new provision, which has been inserted for the purpose of taking up the paper of corporations doing business in foreign countries under what is known as the Edge Act.

On page 7, section 26, is an entirely new section. It is a modification of that provision of the Norris bill which constituted the Government as the agent of any person producing or dealing in agricultural products. The provision found in the proposed substitute simply makes the corporation, with other governmental agencies, an agency to investigate and find foreign markets.

On page 8, section 29 is an entirely new section. It is simply a limitation upon the per cent that may be charged or the rate of interest which may be received on moneys loaned by the corporation.

Under section 12, in line 15, page 8, the corporation may issue notes or bonds in an amount aggregating four times its paid-in capital, whereas in the original act creating the War Finance Corporation the limit was six times its capital stock, which would have enabled it to loan to the extent of $3,000,000,000. Under the provision now found in the substitute the corporation will be permitted to loan up to $2,000,000,000.

I think, Mr. President, that constitutes practically all the changes that have been made by the committee in the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota. That is all I care to say at this time, having pointed out in a brief way the changes which have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Oregon on behalf of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not concerned about the differences that have arisen on the other side of the Chamber between certain Members touching the authorship of this bill or this or that amendment. Neither am I concerned about the differences between certain Members over there and the President, nor between the views of certain Members and the Vice President or the War Finance Corporation. I can understand how the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] felt aggrieved about the action of certain Members of the majority of the Senate in taking from him the bill that he had introduced, and without consultation or conference dethroning him as the leader of this movement and offering a substitute. It is natural that the Senator from Nebraska should have felt somewhat disappointed at the action of the Senator from Minnesota. It is the first time in the history of this body when a chairman of a great committee having in charge a piece of important legislation was excused from continuing the prosecution of it as its leader, and another designated to take up the fight by those who control the administration.

It would have been the natural thing, if precedent had been followed, for those who control the policies of this Government now to confer with the Senator from Nebraska, who has given so much time and so much attention to this question; but, as he stated in his speech, he did not know anything about these conferences that were going on. He was not approached on the question, and his views were not sought. No attempt was made to placate his opposition to the views entertained by others. In other words, they treated him as an orphan child, and left him out in the cold in the consideration of this great question; and I have no little sympathy for his feelings in this matter. I do not know what was behind the action that was taken. I know that the Senator spoke many truths in his speech when he talked about the subterranean channels that now lead from certain parts of this city to the committee rooms here, about his knowledge of the secret conferences that are held in secluded places, and in the tribute that he paid to the present Secretary of the Treasury and to others as being very closely allied to what are generally termed the big business interests of the country.

I do not know whether or not his suggestions are correct, that they had any great influence in his dethronement and in a new leader arising on the other side of the aisle. I will accept what the Senator from Nebraska says touching these matters, because he has a keen insight into the machinery of his party's policies. He has been closely allied with them, and I take it for granted that he knew what he was talking about.

Mr. President, I want to congratulate the leadership of the majority party in the Senate for showing at one time since we assembled here some independence. I think they are to be commended for their action in discarding the suggestions of the President and in not bowing in humble submission to his dictation.

Of course, we all read in the papers, and it was revealed further when the message of the President came a few days ago, that the action of the Agricultural Committee in asking the Senate to pass what was known as the Norris bill would be combated by the administration; that they did not approve that measure; that the Senate would be asked to recommit it; and that the War Finance Corporation was to be given power and authority to loan to the railroads $500,000,000 and to evolve some plan by which it could help out the agricultural situation of the country. We had read that in the papers. I did not know whether it was true or not until the message came. That message showed the intent and purposes of the President, and revealed the fact that the rumors that had been published in the papers were true, and that what the President had in his mind was some relief, primarily and above all other things, to the railroads of the country. So ninety-odd per cent of the message that came to the Senate, as I said the other day, asked for some immediate relief through amending the War Finance Corporation act so that the corporation might loan $500,000,000 to the railroads, and a very, very small part of the message said that the President hoped the suggestions that had been made in certain proposals by way of amendments to the Norris bill would be accepted by the Senate.

There was one peculiar part of that message to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and that was this. It shows how clear the message was. The President says:

There is no thought to ask Congress for additional funds. Perhaps $500,000,000 will be necessary.

Now, of course anybody can understand the clearness of that statement:

There is no thought to ask Congress for additional funds.

In speaking of the railroads, he says:

Perhaps $500,000,000 will be necessary.

And so, of course, he had in his mind that what was needed, and what he desired was that the War Finance Corporation act should be amended so that they could loan to the railroads $500,000,000. But the leadership over there rejected his proposal, rose in their might and in their power, and said to the President, evidently by actions if not by words, that you knew what the people wanted; that you knew that the conditions touching agriculture were of primary importance; that in your mind and in your opinion they were of greater importance than loaning money to the railroads; and for the first time in five months you repudiated the President and said you were going to exercise the functions which the people had elected you to perform.

I hope that this is the beginning of still greater independence and freedom upon the part of the Senate, and I trust that after this committee substitute is adopted and this legislation shall have been passed no Senator on that side will rise up and dim the record that you are making in these few days of independence of action by offering another amendment to the War Finance Corporation act to loan the railroads $500,000,000. It would very largely destroy the opinion I have formed, and I am sure the opinion of the country, as to your independence if you should then undo what you are now doing—that is, impressing the country with your freedom of thought and independence of action.

So, Mr. President, we did not accept the President's ideas on this railroad proposition. I saw in the papers that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] had gone to the President and said to him, "We do not want the two propositions tied together. Let us divorce the railroad question from legislation touching the agricultural situation. Let us take care in one amendment of the agricultural legislation and leave the railroad question in a separate amendment." The Senator from Kansas has performed a great public service in telling the President where to get off, and in informing him so correctly of the sentiment of the Senate for legislation, as proposed either in the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota or in the Senate committee substitute.

Now, Mr. President, getting right down to the proposition before us, there is not any question—it is admitted by everybody—that the agricultural interests to-day are in a very deplorable condition. Those who have served with me on the Agricultural Commission inquiring into agricultural conditions have heard day after day the facts revealed, showing that the purchasing power of agricultural products has gone down below the 100 per cent basis, while everything else has gone up; that the things that the farmer raises have decreased in value, while those things that he must buy have increased in value or have not decreased proportionately as greatly as the products that he raises. People have different ideas as to the causes that have brought about the present conditions in this country; experts have offered various remedies, and so it is not out of place for me to venture an opinion as to why I think the condition in this country to-day is as bad as it is.

I believe that opinion is shared by the great majority of thinking people in America. After the war had been fought and won, after our diplomats and representatives and the representatives of other countries had assembled at Versailles and evolved after months of consideration a treaty which settled the economic conditions, various terms being imposed upon our late enemy, insuring certain rights to the various powers there, if the Senate had ratified that treaty and war conditions had been settled in the orderly way in which all wars have been settled in the past, the present conditions would not prevail in those countries abroad which are depressed and among people everywhere who are in turmoil and distress. This country would have had markets in which to sell their surplus products, and that wonderful prosperity which we enjoyed for so long in America would have continued.

But we discarded the treaty, we repudiated our representatives at Versailles, we went back on the boys who had fought and won the war, and from that day to this there has been doubt and uncertainty throughout the world. Those countries have not known since then what their true position was or what they could do. They have been handicapped in passing legislation to meet world conditions, and here everything has been thrown into a disorganized state.

Of course, the prosperity which we enjoyed was due to the fact that we have heretofore found markets for our surplus products, whether they were products of agriculture or of manufacturing, but because of the unsettled war conditions the foreign countries have been unable to furnish credit to buy our surplus products.

It has been a peculiar thing to me that the short-sighted policy of some so-called statesmen of to-day would lead them to preach the doctrine that what we need is markets abroad, so as to extend and sell our surplus products, and that at the same time they would try to legislate so as to build a wall here which would hamper and destroy our world's commerce. But that is the illogical and unwise policy with which we are now and have been for some time confronted.

Oh, how conditions have changed. To-day we have few or no markets abroad. Mills are shut down; men to the number of 6,000,000 are thrown out of employment; railroads are losing money; farmers are unable to sell their products at reasonable prices; hardly anyone is making money in this day and time; doubt and uncertainty exist among the business people, and we find here and at the other end of the Capitol, as well as at the White House, no fixed program to remedy the present-day conditions or to bring to us the light of a new day. We are just groping in darkness.

Oh, that you could show some statesmanship that would carve the way, that the people of America might be led into a better day, and the old times of prosperity might return. They will never return as long as we travel in the present road and hold to present policies.

Some months ago you said the best way to settle this world condition was to pass a separate peace resolution. You passed it on the 1st day of July, and you were so anxious that your Republican orators should get to the stump on the Fourth of July and tell to the great populaces there assembled that you had accomplished peace that two or three days before you had passed the resolution that brought peace to the world—so anxious were you to get the work accomplished before the Fourth of July that a messenger was sent with the document, at Government expense, to Raritan. I do not know where that is; I never heard of it until the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] became one of the great political leaders in this country and one of the close friends of the present President of the United States. But off this messenger went to Raritan, carrying the resolution declaring for a separate peace with Germany.

We thought everything would be all right then; but what has happened? The same thing happened then that has been happening ever since the 4th of March this year; and this is not politics I am discussing. I read from the Evening Star of July 8 an article headed, "Tentative peace draft is found deficient at meeting of Cabinet." The article reads:

A tentative draft of a proclamation of the state of peace with Germany and Austria was taken to the Cabinet meeting to-day by Attorney General Daugherty, but it was indicated afterwards that the document might not be ready for the President's signature before next week.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What date did this appear?

Mr. HARRISON. This was the 8th of July, six days after the peace resolution was signed by the President. The article continues:

It is understood that when the subject came up in the Cabinet room the discussion revealed that so many points of law would have to be covered in such a proclamation that a more exhaustive study would be necessary.

The Attorney General also took to the meeting a mass of information compiled in memorandum form by experts of the Department of Justice, and it was understood that the whole subject of what the proclamation should contain was considered in some detail. Further memoranda, it is understood, will be prepared for the Attorney General as soon as possible, so that actual issuance of the proclamation may not be unnecessarily delayed.

Although most of the Cabinet meeting was occupied with other matters, it is understood that such discussion as there was of the proposed proclamation brought out that some of the President's advisers still consider a proclamation unnecessary. The preponderance of opinion in high administration circles has seemed to favor issuance of the document, but it is believed that no final decision even on that point has been reached.

Up to this good day, although the resolution declaring for a separate peace with Germany was passed, signed by the President, and became a law on the 2d day of July, up until this good hour the President has not issued his proclamation.

I ask some one on the other side, I appeal to some Member of the majority, to tell me now whether we are still in a technical state of war with Germany. I wait for an answer. I invite an answer to the question. I wish that some of you knew where you "were at." It is a pity that no one here is close enough to the President and the Attorney General, and has studied this question to such an extent, that you can tell us now whether we are in a technical state of peace or war with Germany. Is it necessary for the proclamation to be issued? Was your separate peace resolution sufficient?

No answer comes. Oh, I wish the new leader of the Republican Party in the Senate [Mr. KELLOGG] were in his place. He could tell me, perhaps. I speak of the new administration leader, who has brushed aside the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has had such long and brilliant service in this body; who has brushed aside the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and who brought in his resolution, with his name attached to it, representing the administration forces.

Oh, that the members of the majority party who are on the Committee on Agriculture had enough self-respect, as members of that committee, to condemn the Senator from Minnesota for his assumption of authority in taking charge of the bill that has been so ably handled by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

Now, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has come into the Chamber. I would like to have him tell me if we are now in a technical state of war or peace. I can get no answer from him. How are the American people to know whether we are at peace or in a state of war, when your position on these great public questions is so uncertain, and you leave us so much up in the air and in doubt?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that the Senator from Utah did not even stop as he went through the Chamber.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I think he got a running start before he came into the Chamber.

Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate. It is the only committee on which I coveted membership when I came here. I would prefer to be a member of it than of any other committee of the Senate. The people of my State are interested more in agriculture than in anything else. I want to render some feeble service to them if I can. When I came here as a Senator I sought membership on that committee as a place where I could best render my people service. It has a splendid membership, and that committee has worked hard in trying to evolve some policy to take care of the present distressed situation in agriculture in this country. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is to be commended and congratulated for the magnificent service he has rendered in focusing the attention of the country on this subject, that we might obtain some legislation at this time to meet the condition.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi is propounding his questions so very interestingly, and I am so sure that some of the absentee Republican Senators would be very glad of an opportunity to answer them, that I beg his permission to suggest that there is no quorum present, and would ask that we have the roll called in an effort to get some of those brave leaders here to answer some of these very direct questions.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will not insist on that. I do not care to have a point of no quorum raised, because if the news came to those gentlemen that that question was to be propounded to them, we would have to adjourn Congress for this year; we could not get them here at all. So I hope the Senator will not insist upon his point of no quorum.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska worked hard, as I said, to focus the attention of the country upon some legislation carrying out the ideas contained in the Norris bill. I hardly thought it was possible for him to pass any legislation along the lines suggested in his bill. I did not believe it was possible that the reactionary crowd, which is now controlling the destinies of the country, would even permit the bill to come up on the floor of the Senate to be considered. I congratulate the reactionary crowd for having had a lucid interval and that it is temporarily considering a measure of such importance to the masses of the country.

But the Senator from Nebraska worked hard; he brought out the bill, and he got support day by day for his measure. I know the big papers in the country wrote editorials criticizing it, finding fault with it, and saying it was ruinous to the country to pass it. I know that the powers here and elsewhere in Washington were against the measure, but they saw that there was such a momentum behind it, that it was gathering force so rapidly, that they must get together and have a council of war and propose something that did not go as far as that, but which would in a measure help the situation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Satisfy the appetite.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; satisfy the appetite, as my colleague suggests.

There were many things in the Norris bill of which I did not approve. There were certain amendments that I fought for in the committee. Other Senators members of the committee did not approve of all the provisions of the bill. Other Senators voted with me, and we tried to amend certain phases of the bill. I am glad that the situation to-day in this body touching this legislation is as it is. We are going to get some legislation now, and legislation that is going to be of some real benefit to the agricultural classes of America.

Here is what the Norris bill did. It proposed four things. One was to create a new commission or corporation. I did not believe in that. I think we have enough commissions in the country, and I am anxious to see a reduction in expenditures in the Government. I desire to see a coordination of various governmental agencies rather than the creation of new ones. I believed that the War Finance Corporation could take care of the situation. That was one thing which was proposed in the Norris bill with which I did not agree.

There were in the main three other proposals. May I say to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] and others that everything in the Norris bill was proposed on the theory that they were trying to help the agricultural situation so far as our exports were concerned. It did not deal with our products so far as they could be sold in our domestic trade.

The bill proposed first to buy and to sell agricultural products for export. I was opposed to that feature. I did not want to see my Government in times of peace go into the mercantile business to purchase agricultural products. I did not know what prices would be fixed. I did not know whether they were going to be less than the market price or over the market price. I was not sure whether the corporation that would purchase agricultural products would buy 1 per cent of the products in the United States or 51 per cent. I knew that if 51 per cent were sold to it and if it was unable to buy the other 49 per cent the 49 per cent might be dissatisfied. If it accumulated 51 per cent of the agricultural products of the country and then should throw them on the market for sale, it might affect the price of that amount that was still in the hands of the original producer.

I have not forgotten that in time of war the Government purchased thousands and thousands of pounds of wool, as well as other things, and when the Government wanted to sell that wool the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and others, whose constituents were interested in wool, raised a protest against the sale of that wool, because they said, "If you throw it on the market now it will drive down the price of wool," and until this good day, because of those protests, the Government has thousands and thousands of pounds of wool and canned goods and various other things bought up during the war and is unable to offer them upon the market because they are afraid it might depreciate the prices of similar goods in the hands of the original producers or the men who now hold them.

So I was opposed to that part of the Norris bill that authorized the buying and selling of agricultural products.

There was one other thing in the Norris bill to which I wish to call attention, and that was that the new corporation could act as agent of the producers in America in selling their products for export. I favored that. I am in favor of that. We have in the substitute offered an amendment taking care of that proposal. The Senate substitute does not use the word "agent," but what we had in mind in the Norris bill was that the Government should cooperate with our producers in America, could ascertain the markets in foreign countries, and could make arrangements, if necessary, in cooperation with our producers to sell those products abroad. So we have a provision in the substitute offered upon the part of the committee, known as the McNary amendment, which takes care of that suggestion which was expressed in the Norris bill.

The third and last provision of the Norris bill was to loan money or make advances to persons, governments, and subdivisions of governments without the United States so that they could purchase agricultural products in this country and expend the money here. In that provision it was stated that the securities must be ample and must be sufficient. It also invested the commission with authority to rescind the advancement at any time, to call in the loan whenever they thought the security might be depreciating, and provided that they might call for additional security whenever in their opinion it was good business sense to do so.

So in the substitute that has been offered in the McNary amendment on the part of the committee we have taken care of that proposition and we say that the War Finance Corporation is empowered to make advances to persons, subdivisions of governments, and to governments outside of the United States, if necessary, to buy our agricultural products, but the money must be expended here and the security must be good.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the Kellogg amendment the advances were to be to any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in the United States in dealing in or marketing any such products for the purposes of assisting such persons, firms, corporations, or associations to carry such products until they can be exported, and so forth. Has the amendment of which the Senator speaks, known as the McNary amendment, provided for aid to the producer himself?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I was coming to that. I first desired to differentiate between the two bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. I am anxious that that be explained. It seemed to me that that was an important omission in the Kellogg substitute.

Mr. HARRISON. I desired to discuss the differences between the Norris bill and the committee amendment now proposed, known as the McNary amendment. In other words, the Norris proposition suggested the passage of legislation for three purposes. One was the buying and selling of agricultural products for export. That is eliminated in the McNary amendment. The other provided for an agency. We think we have taken care of that by a provision that is written in the McNary amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the Senator omits the reduction of rates to stimulate production.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I omitted that. There were some features in the Norris bill that called for preferential rates in shipments abroad and for shipments on American ships, and also seasonal rates on the railroads for agricultural products. None of those provisions were included in the committee substitute. We did not think it was wise.

The third proposition embodied in the Norris bill was for advancements to persons, Governments, and subdivisions of Governments without the United States of credit to purchase agricultural products here, and is incorporated in the committee substitute.

Now, let me come to the Kellogg substitute. The Kellogg substitute differs from the McNary substitute in several particulars. First, let me say that in the committee or McNary amendment every provision that is written in the Kellogg amendment is taken care of. The Kellogg amendment first proposed to advance money through the War Finance Corporation to any person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in the United States in dealing in or marketing agricultural products for export.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does that bill define what "person" means?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the committee amendment does.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the definition given?

Mr. HARRISON. The War Finance Corporation act defines what persons, firms, associations, and corporations are. The committee or McNary amendment provides that when used in this bill the term "person" includes partnerships, corporations, and associations as well as individuals.

I have read the first purpose of the Kellogg amendment. We amended that first paragraph for the reason that we thought advancement upon the part of the War Finance Corporation should be made not only to persons, firms, or corporations dealing in or marketing agricultural products for export, but that the man who produced them should be taken care of as well; that it was not going far enough to take care of the export corporations, the associations of people who were dealing in agricultural products by buying from the producer and then selling abroad, but that it should go further and include the person who actually produced the product.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. DIAL. Dealing with him as an individual or as an aggregation of individuals?

Mr. HARRISON. The McNary amendment reads this way:

To any person engaged in the United States in producing—

We placed that language in the amendment—

in producing, dealing in, or marketing such products.

Now, it has been suggested, as I understand, by the War Finance Corporation that the word "person" should be eliminated and that the word "associations" should be inserted. I am opposed to any such suggestion.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. We had quite an exhaustive statement from a member of the War Finance Corporation, who I know is as anxious as is any Member of this body to see that whatever relief may be given through that corporation to the farmer shall be given. He went into an explanation of the reasons why it would be almost impossible for such a corporation, doing the business for which they were created, and their work being extended as we propose to extend it here, to deal directly with every producer in the country, to hunt up his rating and ascertain whether or not he owned the property, whether it was safe for the corporation to deal directly with him; but he stated that it would be practicable for the corporation to deal with associations or institutions, State banks and trust companies, any kind of an organization that they were able to identify and determine whether or not they were safe from a banking standpoint or from a financial standpoint. If the loans were thrown open to any individual and the corporation were required to meet that condition, he thought it would absolutely defeat the very purpose for which we are now striving, and that is, in the most expeditious and safe way that we can, to get the money to the man who produces the crops. At the proper time I shall take the floor and have something to say about this matter, in reference to an organization now existing which I think ought to have been doing this work and not have forced the present condition of affairs.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from South Carolina and myself differ on that proposition, and when the amendment is offered we can each express our opinions by our vote. I am of the opinion that we should extend aid to the producer; if he wants money and has good collateral he should be able to get it. But, after all, the discretionary power is vested in the War Finance Corporation, for the definition of "person" takes in associations, firms, and corporations the same as it does individuals. If the corporation desires to promulgate an order that they will not loan money except to an association, to a number of persons who have banded themselves together, they have that power. If the War Finance Corporation holds that view about it and does not intend to loan money to an individual, whether he produces 500 bales of cotton or 50 bales of cotton, then I am in favor of writing into this bill a direction that they must do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to his colleague?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The security required of the individual and the association is the same, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So that if the commission were furnished the proper security by an individual they would be required, under the very terms of the proposal as it is written in the McNary substitute, to do business with him.

However, the point I was trying to make was that there is no element of danger entering into it, because however humble the individual might be, the security, which is the chief thing, must be there.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the controlling factor in the proposition. So when the amendment suggested by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is offered, if it should be offered, I say I shall oppose any such proposal as that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator if, for the same reasons he has given why the power to extend loans to individuals by the War Finance Corporation ought to be provided, he thinks similar provision should be made with reference to loans which are made by the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. HARRISON. By the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The Federal reserve banks are not permitted to loan except to member banks.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator is going to throw open to individuals the advances that are to be made to the War Finance Corporation, he ought likewise to open the doors and to permit the Federal reserve banks to loan to individuals.

Mr. HARRISON. I can not follow the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The reason for such action would be the same in both cases.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from North Carolina thinks that the reasons are the same, but I can see a great deal of difference notwithstanding the usual logic of the Senator's reasoning. The Federal reserve system is made up of member banks; it operates through member banks loaning money to individuals. The War Finance Corporation has not a set of members or War Finance Corporation officers throughout the country. So, if we are going to advance money to the producers of the country, it seems to me that we can loan it as well to the individual as we can to any association of persons that might come together.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DIAL. Would it not involve almost unending bookkeeping to try to deal with individuals?

Mr. HARRISON. If we are going on the theory here that it is impossible for the War Finance Corporation to render a service to the people because it is going to require too many employees and will be cumbersome, then, well and good; but if the system is right, if the principle is right, if the benefit can accrue, I am in favor of passing the legislation and permitting the corporation to devise the plan for carrying it out.

Mr. DIAL. It might be found, however, that in the working out of this plan, in ascertaining the ownership of the products, mortgages, and so forth, there would ensue almost unlimited complications.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi if it would not be just as easy and just as secure to deal with an association of producers as it would be to deal with an association of middlemen? There ought not to be any difference in principle.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely there should not be.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely the producers ought not to be excluded from the benefits of this system when the middlemen, those who are handling the producers' crops, are included.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, the proposition has not yet been presented to the full committee, because it was drafted only this morning, but there is an amendment which will be submitted, perhaps, to the committee, or, if not to the committee, which will be submitted to the Senate, allowing associations of producers to deal directly with the War Finance Corporation.

If the Senator will further allow me, I desire to say that he can see at a glance that we must utilize as efficiently as possible all the little country banks and financial institutions already established. They are almost innumerable; but they are now so loaded up with farm obligations as almost to be past functioning. The War Finance Corporation under this proposed measure will now come in and relieve such banks of that paper to such an extent as will allow them in turn to discharge the financial functions for which they were established in all of the States. Under the McNary substitute, where a State law has placed a limitation upon banks, that they may not assume obligations beyond a certain percentage of their capital and surplus, in order to meet that a provision has been inserted that the War Finance Corporation may buy outright such obligations and hold them in lieu of the bank holding them for the farmers who hypothecated the paper, thereby relieving the banks from the limitations and prohibitions of the State law and putting them in a position where they may then make still further advances and deal with their clients as they personally and intimately know them. It seems to me, if the Senator will allow me, that it would be infinitely better to have the War Finance Corporation, composed of four or five or seven men who do not know the local conditions or know intimately the individuals who need the help, render the aid to the institutions within the States that do know the individuals, and thereby relieve the situation and expedite their business. For that reason I favored the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. The provision of the bill to which the Senator has referred is a very splendid one, but that is another provision that I was coming to later. The question that some difference has arisen about now is whether or not the War Finance Corporation shall advance money directly to the individuals who produce the crops or shall compel them to get together in associations in order to borrow the money or pay higher rates and procure the advancement through banks. If that rule be adopted, so far as my State is concerned I know about two associations there that could borrow money, and they would naturally have to go to a bank and borrow it and pay interest, and then the banker could make something by borrowing from the War Finance Corporation; in other words, if the Senator's idea prevails, these applications from individual producers will be compelled to go through two or three hands; the natural increase in costs and rates to the individual producer will be thrown upon him.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. This is a matter of such serious importance and one that involves so much that we have to go safely and perhaps slowly in framing our legislation. The function to which the Senator refers is one that ought to have been performed by the Federal reserve banks of the country. The member banks are the ones who come in contact with the individual; the regional bank is the one which holds the reserve and accumulates the capital to aid the member banks. The Federal reserve banks now boast that they have over $1,000,000,000 of free gold and two and a quarter billion dollars of liquid assets against which there is no legal requirement.

Now, we are asking the War Finance Corporation to meet a situation which in part can not be met even by the Federal reserve act. The Federal reserve act limits agricultural and cattle paper to six months, although, of course, they can renew it; but under the provisions of the measure now proposed that paper can be carried for two years or longer. The limitations applicable to ordinary banking do not apply to the War Finance Corporation under the measure now proposed.

The aim and object in modifying this proposed legislation so as to make it apply to others than exporters is this: The foreign markets have been practically closed; they are practically dead for the time being, as is alleged. The effect has been to dam back and to flood this country with commodities that ordinarily would have moved in export. Now, the question as to what we are going to do to enable the men who produce the commodities to hold them until the export market is open is equally as serious as the finding of a market abroad. We propose now to place on the War Finance Corporation a dual duty—to try to help carry for an indefinite period the products that we have on hand and in the meantime assiduously to hunt safe places for the sale of our products abroad. If they shall be able to accomplish the relief of the country banks, farmers' organizations, and other associations which are financially so organized as to function immediately, they will have a task that will tax them to the utmost. As a farmer, who has no other vocation or avocation than farming, I will say that if my local bank can be relieved of the paper that they have been carrying and enabled to extend me another loan, and the War Finance Corporation can take that paper through an organization, I for one am satisfied and welcome it as an immediate relief to a terrible condition.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator is exactly right that the other provisions found in the Kellogg amendment which are now incorporated in the committee amendment are very splendid provisions and what he has said about those provisions is all true, but the point that we were discussing—and I do not want Senators to get away from it—is that the Norris bill proposed to advance money to the person who raised the product for export. Influence was brought about to defeat that proposal. It was desired that the loans be handled through the banks, that they be handled through the middlemen, through the marketing concerns. The Senate committee said, through its amendment, that the individual who produced the commodity should be entitled to relief and should receive the loan; and yet the War Finance Corporation, I am afraid, is now bringing the pressure of its influence, and says, "We do not want to make the advancement to the man who produces the commodity, but to organized associations." I am against that; I am for the man who produces the stuff, whether he raises 1 bale of cotton or 500 bales of cotton, having the same opportunities as the man who can join with others and organize an association to borrow the money.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator from Mississippi will yield for a moment further, he is, I am afraid, likely to fall into the error that it seems to me a number of us may be liable to fall into in this discussion. Do not let us burden the War Finance Corporation with the work of the Federal reserve system. There is where our amendments and our attention should be turned for the relief of the individual. We have the machinery; let us have the nerve and manhood to so amend the Federal reserve act as to make the Federal reserve system do the work for which it was created. We have been forced to enact the legislation which is now proposed because of the lack of a proper administration of the Federal reserve act.

The Federal reserve system is the one that we intended to reach the individual. It is the one that should be made to reach the individual by regulating its rates of rediscount and the manner in which it shall liquidate the real wealth in the form of farm products, and the products of forest and factory as well, instead of taking a temporary thing, a thing that is to meet an emergency on account of the acute conditions growing out of the war, that is to meet a peculiar situation, and making it do the work that a permanent piece of legislation was supposed to do. Let us meet the emergency with the emergency legislation, and amend the permanent legislation to meet the condition of the agriculturist for all time to come. The War Finance Corporation is not going to last forever.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, when the question of amending the Federal reserve act comes up we can then deal with it through the member banks; but we are dealing now with the War Finance Corporation, and I hope we shall not back water on this committee amendment as to dealing with the actual producer. Let us for a while keep our minds on him.

I am a great admirer of the War Finance Corporation. It has rendered a great service. I believe that it has been of more real benefit to my people than any other governmental agency. It has advanced to the people who have cotton in my State no less, I should say, than twelve or fifteen million dollars. It has been of the greatest benefit to them. I know of no application for a loan based on good security that has been made to the War Finance Corporation since it was reorganized that has not been approved and the advance made. I admire the personnel of the War Finance Corporation, and that was one of the reasons why I opposed the creation of a new commission and advocated empowering the War Finance Corporation with these additional powers.

I believe that Eugene Meyer is a great, forward-looking, progressive American business man. I believe that he understands thoroughly our problems in the South, as he understands the problems of the West and the North and the East. He is in entire sympathy with our people and knows our condition. He understands the economic problems of this and other countries. He has a broad vision. Knowing him as I do, together with the other men who make up the War Finance Corporation—and I mention especially the gentleman from North Carolina, Angus McLean, an efficient, accommodating, able business man—I have entire confidence in the personnel of the corporation and believe that real service and greater benefits will come from it; but I am opposed to their bringing their influence, if such be the case, to bear now to restrict the powers that might bring relief to the people when they sought or winked at the suggestion to be incorporated in this bill to do these things that are proposed, instead of the creation of a new commission. Now, everybody knows that. I am not stating anything about which there is any secrecy. If they wanted to do it, and still said that they could not do it, that it was impossible for them to do it, why should they seek the authority to do it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is doing the members of the War Finance Corporation an injustice when he says that they are bringing their influence to bear to defeat what he is advocating.

Mr. HARRISON. No; they are not seeking to defeat what I am advocating.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, to defeat the provision of the bill that the Senator is advocating.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. The Senator from South Carolina says one of its members suggested the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding is—and I heard Mr. McLean's statement this morning—that they come to the sponsors of this bill in the Senate and say: "If you make us the banker for the six or eight millions of farmers of this country, then you have got to give us an organization adequate to the discharge of those functions."

Mr. HARRISON. And they should be given it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, there is but one Finance Corporation. If the idea of the Senator prevails, and if we adopt the amendment that he is advocating, that Finance Corporation will have to do business from one end of the country to the other with all the farmers that may want relief in the present financial situation; so that you make this one body, located here in Washington, with a small personnel, the banker for several millions of farmers in this country. Now, you know what sort of an organization a large bank in a town of five or six thousand people must maintain in order to accommodate the customers of that community. You know what has to be the size of the organization of a big financial institution in New York, like the National City Bank, to accommodate the customers of that great city. If you are going to make this bank take in this broad territory, the whole United States, and perform the functions of banker for 43 per cent of all the people of the United States—for there are that many of them that are farmers—then, Mr. President, not only will you have to provide for a great organization here in Washington but you ought to set up branch or subsidiary organizations in every State of this Union.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, that does not frighten me.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have the Federal reserve system. That organization deals only with banks; it has no authority to loan except to banks; and yet when we created that system we provided for 12 regional banks, and we provided further that in each one of these regions there should be established, if it was found necessary, branch banks, and in some of them it has been found necessary to establish from three to four branch banks.

What Mr. McLean said this morning was this: "If you are going to open the doors wide and make us bankers in the sense of accommodating each individual person who desires to make a loan in these conditions, you will have to provide an organization adequate to the requirements of the situation." That was the representation he made and it appealed most forcefully to me.

Will the Senator pardon me for another suggestion?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the individual farmers who will want to seek the aid of this corporation will be benefited by the provision which the Senator insists upon. If the individual farmer himself is to be the borrower, he can not hope to borrow upon such security as the ordinary individual can offer, especially where the lender, as in this case, is situated perhaps a thousand miles from the borrower, with no opportunity to make a thorough investigation of the financial responsibility of the farmer—

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. Just let me finish this, please; then I will yield to the Senator if I may.

He could not expect, under those circumstances, to borrow to the extent of 100 per cent of his requirements upon the security of his crops. He might possibly be able to get 75 per cent, but that would be a large advance. If he may go to the bank under this bill, and if the bank of his community makes to him an advance upon his crop covering his whole requirements, that bank can come and borrow from the corporation the full amount of the advance made to the farmer—not 90 per cent, not 75 per cent, but 100 per cent of that advance—and the bank therefore acts as a conduit in this case to convey to the farmer 100 per cent, whereas if the farmer himself were to go he probably would not be able to secure exceeding 75 per cent. If the Senator will think about it, I think that will appeal to him.

Again, if the farmer had to pay a little more interest by reason of the fact that he borrowed through the bank instead of directly from the corporation, he would avoid certain expenses, and probably heavy expenses, that would be incident to most of the transactions that would take place if he had been the direct borrower himself—the expenses of securing an investigation into the title of his property, of securing the execution of papers, and all the other incidents connected with the making of a loan by an institution that has no touch with the financial condition or the character or the probable assets of the borrower.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield now to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, my purpose was to ask a question of the Senator from North Carolina, with the permission of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from North Carolina was stating, with his usual force, his objection to the individual as a borrower.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me correct the Senator right there. I should have no objection at all to that if I thought it could be done with advantage to the individual, or if I thought it could be done by this organization without destroying its power to deal with the situation.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I understand. The question that I wish to ask the Senator is this: He knows that in the South a great many of the farmers—perhaps a majority of them—store their cotton with what we call cotton factors. In the West I do not know what our brethren call those with whom they store their wheat, whether elevator men or commission men or what; but I am alluding to a class with whom we store our cotton and secure advances upon it, if we can. Would the Senator from North Carolina see the same objection to amending this bill so as to allow the War Finance Corporation to advance money to that cotton factor, for instance, so that he in turn may advance to the individual?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I would not see the same objection, because that is a class, and not the whole body of the agricultural population.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield, and to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to all three of the Senators.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to state to the Senator from Georgia that that very point was covered this morning; and in certain amendments that are to be proposed it was intended that those who finance these crops, like cotton factors, men who are engaged in the business and have accumulated these products, shall have the same privilege as bankers. As I say, that was intended in the amendments that are to be proposed, where we use the word "association"; and I hope that at a meeting of the committee in the morning that may be done, because I think that was the intent of the amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I hope so.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this has been quite interesting. The objection of the Senator from North Carolina to allowing the War Finance Corporation to make advances to the individual producer is because the War Finance Corporation would have to enlarge its offices, might establish branch offices, or something, and he illustrates by citing the case of the Federal reserve system. You must employ additional help in the War Finance Corporation if it carries out the purposes of this act, whether or not you incorporate the suggestion of the Committee on Agriculture to make advances to the individual producer, because under the Kellogg amendment the corporation can make advances to the middlemen and to all those engaged in marketing the products. We do not know how large that business will be, and the Senator is assuming that every farmer in this country is going to seek aid from the War Finance Corporation. I do not think that is true; but it does not appeal to my sense of justice to say that a farmer who has 50 bales of cotton, or 20 bales of cotton, or other agricultural products should be compelled by law to go over to some association, to a bank, which will charge him interest or other charges, perhaps, on the money that they will loan, but which was advanced to it at a lower rate of interest by the War Finance Corporation. I can see no difference between that association of individuals coming to the War Finance Corporation, placing good securities, and getting money, and the individual in the State, who might have 500 bales of cotton stored away in a warehouse, licensed under the warehouse act, coming up here with his receipts and borrowing money directly from the War Finance Corporation. There is not any justice in it, and, in my opinion, there is not any reason in it, and I am ready, as one Senator, to vote additional appropriations to the War Finance Corporation, if they need it, to employ enough individuals to go through this country, take these applications, look over the securities, report to the War Finance Corporation with the recommendations, and allow the advancements to be made. Of course, I am assuming that the men who are to be employed will know their business and that the securities will be safe. I know it may take time and investigation, but the benefit accruing therefrom to the individual producer will repay the Government or War Finance Corporation for the trouble and inconvenience thereby incurred to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to his colleague?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask my colleague if he can see any difference between these two cases: I have, say, 100 bales of cotton in a warehouse, with the warehouse receipt and certificate, and I carry those certificates to the bank of my town. Can my colleague see any difference between lending me the money upon those certificates and lending the bank the money upon them, when the security, of course, is identically the same? Or can the Senator see any justification in making me go to the bank and pay a larger price for the accommodation, which necessarily will follow, than I would have to pay if the transaction were directly between me and this corporation?

Mr. HARRISON. I was just going to state that the only difference I could see in the two cases presented by my colleague is that if he went to the bank to borrow the money on the same security and were prevented from going to the War Finance Corporation and getting the money he would have to pay the banker perhaps 10 per cent on the investment, and the banker could come here, with the same collateral, and borrow the money from the War Finance Corporation perhaps for 8 per cent. By the provisions of the committee substitute a limitation of 2 per cent is placed on the bank or concern that loans the money when it is advanced by the War Finance Corporation. In other words, if the bank borrows from the corporation and is charged 6 per cent interest the limitation imposed in the committee substitute prevents the bank from charging more than 8 per cent, or 2 per cent increase to its customer.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is indicting his own bank, and saying that a corporation a thousand miles away from him—

Mr. HARRISON. No; I will say to the Senator I had in mind a bank in South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH (continuing). Would deal more leniently with him than would his own bank, which is right there, and amenable to the State law. It seems to me that if such a condition existed as he outlines here, namely, that his local banker would charge him 10 per cent, while the War Finance Corporation would charge him only 4 or 5, the State law should be amended. But that is not the point I wanted to meet, as brought out by the senior Senator from Mississippi. Everybody knows that if he goes to his local banker, the local banker knows him and knows that he owns the security, and that there is no doubt as to the ownership, or as to the equity in the thing which is presented. But if the Senator would take that warehouse certificate and his note, leave Mississippi and come to Washington, does he not know they would have to investigate to find whether he did own the product, or whether he did not own it?

Mr. HARRISON. And they should.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that they would, of course, and I know that the bank at home has to do it, too, unless the bank knows me so exceedingly well that they just take my word for it.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is an exceptional case. I might be known so well that the bank would do that, or the Senator might be; but that is not the way banks do business.

Mr. HARRISON. Would it not have to do it with an association?

Mr. SMITH. Just a moment. One of two things would have to happen in this case: Either you would have to come to Washington, or they would have to have an agent down there. They would have to have an agent in every village, hamlet, and town in the country. In all reason and common sense, as this is an emergency and we are going to relieve a situation, does not everything point to the fact that this corporation, created for the purpose of enabling farmers to export and for the purpose of opening foreign markets, and under this peculiar condition, incidentally, aiding the holding of the stuff until it can be exported, should be empowered to deal with financial agencies set up, which could expedite the matter rather than diverting them into new and untried channels and compelling it to pass upon the credit of every man who takes a loan?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in reply, even if I believed this provision would not result in the corporation lending $100,000 directly to the producers throughout the entire United States, I would still be in favor of it because of the wave of caution which would spread amongst the middlemen who were dealing with the producer, and I think the chief benefit will come just in that way. Instead of lending at whatever your State allows as a rate of interest—in special cases in Mississippi they are allowed to charge 10 per cent—instead of charging all that the traffic would bear when dealing with the bank's client, if it were known that the producer, with that same security in the shape of warehouse certificates which could be readily certified, there being no doubt about their authenticity, could go further and get the money at 6 per cent, then that bank would charge him only 7, enough to cover expenses and a very small profit.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Mississippi is going upon the hypothesis that this is a permanent piece of legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; I am not.

Mr. SMITH. This is an emergency. The corporation is not to take the place of your local bank but is to be set up on the ground that your local bank is unable to go any further, and this corporation is trying to help that bank to help you.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my opinion is that it would help the local bank all the more, and would help the producer very much more, if this provision were in the bill, whether it was ever used to any great extent or not, and however temporary the relief might be, and however temporary the operations of the Finance Corporation might be.

Mr. SMITH. Then, Mr. President, the argument of the senior Senator from Mississippi is that we are not trying to relieve the congested situation, but are trying to save a certain amount of interest. That is not the primary object of this legislation at all. The primary object of this legislation is to supplement the credits where they are needed and let the individuals in the several States know that the local institutions will be relieved of the burden and be able to extend them further accommodations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am quite well aware of the fact that this legislation is to relieve a congested situation. I am also quite well aware of the fact that relieving that congested situation with the least expense possible to the man who is suffering most—the producer—is a desirable object.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I think this provision will tend toward the accomplishment of that object.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I just wanted to suggest this fact to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], in connection with the argument he has just made; or I will suggest it to the Senator from Mississippi, as the Senator from South Carolina has taken his seat. The provision we are now discussing is substantially the same principle which we incorporated in the original War Finance Corporation act during the war, for we had then an emergency situation very much like the one we have now in connection with agriculture. The great munition factories of this country, plants which were making the things that we required for the prosecution of the war, found that they were not able to secure, through the ordinary channels, sufficient money to enable them to supply the great demands of that time, they asked that some relief be given, and we established this corporation chiefly to relieve that situation.

The provision of the bill, then, was that the corporation might loan to banks upon advances made by them to aid our war industries, and only to aid our war industries, or industries tributary to the war. In this bill we revive that old provision of the War Finance Corporation, and we apply it to advances made by banks to aid agriculture.

When we created the corporation and enabled it to finance these war industries, we did not permit the war industries to go directly to the corporation for the money they wanted. We required them to go to the corporation through a banking institution, and for the very same reasons which obtained in that case, as this substitute was originally drawn it required farmers to go to the corporation through the banks.

During the war, when the function of this corporation was to aid these war industries, they were able to aid them, because they did not have to deal with every individual who was engaged in doing anything that was contributory to the war.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not mean to say that during the war and since the revival of the War Finance Corporation, if the General Electric Co. should desire a loan from the War Finance Corporation, it must approach the War Finance Corporation through a bank?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. They can obtain the loan directly?

Mr. SIMMONS. There were some exceptions.

Mr. HARRISON. That is why I want an exception for the individual producer.

Mr. SIMMONS. So, there are exceptions here. There are certain other organizations, like farmers' associations, which are permitted to go directly to the War Finance Corporation. The electric company about which the Senator speaks and the utilities company were permitted to go to the corporation, but they were organizations and were not individuals. There is not a line in the original act that permitted an individual to go to the corporation.

Mr. HARRISON. I can not understand the Senator's viewpoint on the proposition.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina for a question.

Mr. DIAL. I should like to ask the Senator, if the War Finance Corporation should undertake to deal directly with the individual and lend money on his commodity, whether it would not take an army of insurance agents to see that the property was properly insured?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think it is going to take any such army. I think the War Finance Corporation must enlarge their force, of course. If they advance money to the people who are dealing in agricultural products or marketing them, the middlemen, whether they are firms, corporations, or what not, they must necessarily enlarge their force. That is provided for in the Kellogg substitute. They have to enlarge their force to do that, but what is the objection to taking it right down to the producer, to the man who produces the stuff? It seems to me it is not the proper thing, and I know not the just thing, to say to the producer that he has to go to the expense of organizing himself and others into an association, or to deal through some already existing firm or corporation or bank rather than to give him the direct advantage.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to suggest that as between the warehouseman, no matter whether dealing in grain, cotton, or what not, and the banks there stands the middleman, and the Senator from South Carolina can not have forgotten that one man holding warehouse receipts between the Augusta warehouse and the Georgia Railroad Bank for $80,000 would have ruined the bank if it had not been so strong. Why should not the factor be allowed the same right that the Georgia Railroad Bank had upon a forged certificate?

Mr. DIAL. Experience shows that it is well to have at least two sources of responsibility on paper, and I would like that principle to be applied in this case. I want to help the producer in every possible way that is practicable, but I do not think that we will help him in the way suggested. Thousands of them would write letters, and it would be necessary to have an enormous force, otherwise the letters could not possibly be answered. It would cost as much, in my opinion, to send an abstract of his title or certificates that there were no encumbrances upon his property, as it would to get the indorsement through some of these local institutions that are provided for in the Kellogg bill. The warehouse receipts are not absolutely safe all the time. We have to know that the owner has undisputed title to the property and we have to know that the property is not encumbered. There are various questions to look into.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that, and we are giving broad powers to the War Finance Corporation to say what collateral is good. We are not directing that they shall make a loan. I am assuming that the men comprising the War Finance Corporation are not going to take any collateral that does not substantially and safely secure the investment.

Mr. DIAL. But we have no right as a Congress to place an undue burden upon the War Finance Corporation and then have the people of the country abuse them for doing what we know is not good business for them to do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would make the suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina that it will not be any more of a burden upon the War Finance Corporation to look into the business responsibility and reliability of producers than it is for them to do the same thing as to the middlemen. It must be their duty to find out if the securities are good, whether they are held by middlemen or held by the producers. As a general rule, the securities held by the producers will be found to be safer and better than those held by the middlemen, because the middlemen are trading on what the other men have produced.

Mr. DIAL. They could not be safer and better, because they would have both.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, if Senators will permit me, I shall endeavor to get through very quickly, because there is another Senator who desires to speak on the matter.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. I hesitate to interrupt this colloquy between southern Senators on banking questions; but, after all is said and done, is not the main object of the emergency legislation originally designed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], amended by the Kellogg substitute and later by the committee substitute, for the purpose of taking advantage of the foreign market for exportation? Is not that correct?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. EDGE. That being correct, then does it not naturally follow that when we attempt to deal with the individual planter, speaking now from the cotton standpoint, who owns 10 or 20 or even 50 bales, that it is absolutely beyond the original scope of the legislation and absolutely impracticable? No exportation, of course, would be of less than hundreds or thousands of bales in the ordinary way, and those bales must be collected by associations or through banking institutions. It is possible to go further, as I understand it, and organize a tremendous institution dealing directly with the individual, but we are facing an emergency, we are trying to solve the difficulties of the emergency, so why enter into an intricate organization of that character, which I am afraid will not serve the purpose which the Senator really is desirous of serving?

Mr. HARRISON. I shall proceed and hope to finish very soon. I never have believed in the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which I think was quite exaggerated, when he said this substitute was a bankers' proposition. I take issue with him, but it looks to me very much as if we are getting around to that situation. I hope that suspicion will not develop into a fact. What we first started to discuss and endeavor to accomplish was something for the person who produces agricultural products for export. Let us not get too far away from that proposition.

It came to those who were opposing the bill that if we would eliminate from the Norris bill the question of buying and selling agricultural products and place the authority in the hands of the War Finance Corporation the Norris bill could be passed. The Norris bill provided that advances should be made to persons producing agricultural products in this country for export, but we have gotten away from that in the Kellogg proposition, so that advances can be made only to the middleman or to the person who is dealing in or marketing or to the bank that made the advances. The Kellogg amendment got entirely away from the provisions of the Norris bill. While it authorizes the War Finance Corporation to make advances to the banks which have made loans and have securities based upon agricultural products, and authorizes the War Finance Corporation to purchase the notes and other collateral securing agricultural products, it does not authorize the War Finance Corporation to advance to or deal with the actual producer. It seems that those who were many in supporting the idea in the Norris bill have been led astray by the Kellogg substitute. The issue in the two proposals as carried in the two substitutes is clear. So if the fight must come on it, let it come.
